SANTARR, M., sar-ah-tair, commandant of the national guard of Paris, and general in the republican army, was a rich brewer, who, having acquired some influence with the citizens, availed himself of the circumstance to act a part in the French revolution. He made himself conspicuous at the demolition of the Bastille on the 14th of July, 1793; and having been appointed to command a battalion of the Parisian guard, figured on the 20th of June, 1791, as the agent to intimidate the minority in the legislative assembly, and assist in delivering up Louis XVI. and his unhappy family to the violence of the mob. He presided at the king's execution on the 21st January, 1793; and, by ordering the drums to beat when his majesty attempted to speak, prevented the voice of the victim from being heard. On the 10th of June following, he headed 14,000 men against the royalist army; but his campaign was a failure. In the death of Danton he lost his chief inspirer, and the committee of public safety suspecting his fidelity, he was arrested in 1794. He obtained his liberty, however, and then sunk into obscurity. d. 1840.

b. at Paris, 1600; d. at the same place, 1660. Sapor I., saf-jar, king of Persia, succeeded his father Artaxerxes about A.D. 226. He invaded Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia, and in 260 made the emperor Valerian prisoner; but after being defeated by Odenatus, he was assassinated by his subjects in 271.

Sapor II., who succeeded his father Hormisdas II., was a warlike prince, and gained many advantages over the Romans; but tarnished his glory by a dreadful persecution of the Christians. d. 384.

Sapor III. succeeded Artaxerxes II., and reigned from 384 to 398.

Sapor, king of Armenia, was the son of Yazdegerd I., king of Persia, and was proclaimed at the death of Khosrou III., to the prejudice of Varanes Sapor. He attempted in vain to detach his subjects from Christianity and form an alliance with the Romans. Whilst making a journey to Ctesiphon, in 420, an insurrection burst forth in Armenia, which resulted in his losing the crown. He was treacherously slain by his brother Behram V. in the same year.

SAPPHO, saf-so, a celebrated Greek poetess, who was the inventor of the "Sapphic verse." She excelled in lyric verse, and was held in such estimation by her countrymen that they stamped her image on their coins. She is said to have fallen in love with a young man named Phaon, who slighted her; on which she threw herself into the sea from the Leucadian rock; but Muller declares this to be a mere fiction. Fragments of her poems are extant. b. at Lesbos, and flourished about 600 B.C.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Sarto

"Father Paul," an eminent Italian historian, who became a member of the religious order of Servites, and while still a young man acquired a great reputation for his extensive learning and penetrating genius. Besides his acquaintance with ancient and modern languages, he was well versed in mathematics, theology, and medicine. In the disputes between the republic of Venice and Pope Paul V. he displayed so much ability on behalf of his country, that the pope ordered him to Rome, and on his refusal to go thither, excommunicated him. This did not abate the zeal of the virtuous citizen, who continued to vigorously maintain the rights of Venice against the pretended authority of the pope. An attempt was then made to murder him, and he was attacked on the bridge of St. Mark by five assassins, who left him pierced with wounds. This infamous deed roused the indignation of the senate, who offered large rewards for the apprehension of the assassins; but they were never discovered. Father Paul recovered from his wounds, but with ruined health. He wrote several esteemed works; the chief of which were, "The History of the Council of Trent," "Considerations on the Censures of Paul V. against the Republic of Venice," and "Treatise concerning the Inquisition." n. at Venice, 1552; p. 1623.

SARTO, Andrea Vauccchi, sar-to, usually styled del Sarto, a celebrated Italian painter, so named from being the son of a tailor. He was invited to Paris by Francis I., for whom he painted several fine pictures. Florence also contains some examples of his genius. His pictures are admirably designed, and are remarkable for the excellence of the draperies. n. at Florence, 1489; p. of the plague, 1530.

SAULCY, Louis Félixien Joseph Caignart de, sole-se, a modern French antiquary, who was educated for the military profession, and was attached to the army as an artillery officer, but devoted his leisure to the study of archaeology and numismatics. His early works upon those sciences obtained a great amount of success. In 1836 he gained a prize from the Institute for his work entitled "An Essay on the Classification of Byzantine Coins," and subsequently became professor of mechanics at the military school of Metz. Having been fortunate enough to secure the notice of the duke of Orleans, eldest son of Louis Philippe, he was appointed conservator of the Museum of Artillery at Paris, and was thus enabled to prosecute his studies under more favourable circumstances. In 1850 he set out for Palestine, with the view of making researches into the antiquities of the Holy Land. Upon his return to France he announced that he had discovered the site of the city of Sodom, and declared that he had ascertained the monuments known as the "Tombs of the Kings" to be, in reality, those of the kings of Judah. He, at the same time, presented to the Louvre a sarcophagus, which he supposed to be that of King David. These assertions provoked an animated discussion in the learned world, but he defended his views with the greatest warmth. About the same time he produced his work entitled "Travels upon the Shores of the Dead Sea and in the Biblical Countries," with maps and plates. He then resumed his archaeological studies, and produced, among other valuable works, "Studies on Judaic Numismatics," and also contributed a number of learned papers to the French scientific journals. His latest work was a "History of Judaic Art, founded upon the Sacred and Profane Writings." In 1859 he was created a senator, having previously been elected a member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres, as well as being made an officer of the Legion of Honour. n. at Lille, 1807.

SAUMAISE, or SALMASIUS, Claude, so'-maïsse, a learned French writer, who received his first education under his father, and afterwards studied at Paris and Heidelberg. Richelieu offered him a considerable pension on condition of settling in France, which Saumaise refused. The king, however, conferred on him the order of St. Michael and the brevet of a councillor of state. In 1649 he wrote an able defence of Charles I., king of England, which was replied to by Milton. The year following, he went to Sweden, on an invitation from Queen Christina. His principal works, which were written in Latin, were commentaries upon Florus, Polyhistor, Hippocrates, &c. n. 1588; p. 1653.

SAUMAREZ, James, Lord de, so'-ma-rez, a celebrated English admiral, who entered the royal navy in his thirteenth year. In 1775 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant for his brave conduct at the attack upon Charlestown in America, and became commander in 1781, in reward of his gallant behaviour during the action off the Dogger Bank, between the English fleet, under Sir Hyde Parker, and the Dutch, commanded by Admiral Zoutman. He next distinguished himself in the action wherein Admiral Rodney defeated the French fleet under the Count de Grasse; and, peace being soon afterwards proclaimed, he returned to Guernsey, his native island. In 1793 hostilities again commenced between the English and the French republic, and Captain Saumarez was appointed to the Crescent frigate, in which, after a desperate fight off Cherbourg, he captured the French frigate La Réunion. For this service he was knighted. In 1794 he saved a small force of three frigates which had been attacked in the English Channel by an enemy more than doubly superior in numbers. In the following year he signalized himself in the action under Lord Bridport; and in 1797 bore a gallant part in the defeat of the Spaniards off Cape St. Vincent. He was second in command at the battle of the Nile, where he was severely wounded. He became a rear-admiral in 1801, and was created a baronet. In the same year he made an attack upon a French and Spanish fleet of ten sail of the line and four frigates, with a force of less than half that number; but although, in consequence of the disabled condition of his vessels, he could not prevent the enemy from re-entering Cadiz, he caused them a loss of three ships and 3000 men, blown up, killed, or taken prisoners. Hereupon, he was rewarded with the order of the Bath, and received the thanks of Parliament, Lord Nelson declaring that "a greater action was never fought." After performing other distinguished services, he, at the close of the war in 1814, became full admiral, was personally thanked by allied sovereigns on their visit to England, and was subsequently appointed vice-admiral of Great Britain. When William IV. ascended the throne, in 1831, he was created Lord de Saumarez, of Saumarez, in the island of Guernsey, and a general of marines. He spent the remainder of his life in quiet retirement upon his estate in Guernsey. The "Memoirs and Correspondence" of this brave and skilful English seaman have been published by Sir John Ross, and his gallant deeds are narrated in detail in the "Naval History" of James. n. 1757; p. 18 38.

pox, and yet acquired a proficiency in classical learning, though it is not mentioned by what means. At the age of eighteen he was introduced to Mr. West, a gentleman of fortune, and a lover of the mathematics, who instructed him in algebra and geometry; and he made such progress that his friends sent him to Cambridge, where he delivered lectures on mathematics to crowded audiences. Having been created master of arts by royal mandate, he was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics in 1711, and in 1718 received the degree of doctor of laws from George II. visited the university. His "Elements of Algebra" were printed at Cambridge in 1740, and his "Treatise on Fluxions" was also printed after his death. n. at Tharleston, Yorkshire, 1682; p. 1739.

SAURIN, Jacques, so'-ra, a celebrated French Protestant divine, who went with his father to Geneva, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. In the seventeenth year of his age he quitted his studies to bear arms in the English service, but soon returned to Geneva. On finishing his education he went to London, and preached among his fellow exiles for five years. About 1705 he went to Holland, where he became minister of the French church at the Hague. He was an eloquent and majestic preacher. His sermons, in twelve volumes, are impassioned and powerfully persuasive. They have been translated into English by Robinson and Hunter. But his greatest work is entitled "Discourses, Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most Memorable Events of the Old and New Testaments." n. at Nîmes, 1677; p. 1730.

SAURIN, Bernard Joseph, a French dramatist; poet, and son of the preceding, was intimate with Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Helvetius, of whom the last-named allowed him a pension. He wrote several plays of merit; a "Spartacus," and "Blanche and Richard," tragedies; and the "Anglomania," a comedy. His dramatic works were printed in 1783. n. at Paris, 1706; p. 1781.

SAURIN, Joseph, a French mathematician who entered the ministry of the Protestant church; but, in 1680, alighted that religion in Paris, obtained a pension from the government and devoted himself to mathematical science. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences. Jean Baptiste Rousseau, having been accused of writing some libellous verses against persons of distinction, falsely charged Saurin with being the author. Saurin was, however, acquitted, and his accuser banished. He contributed many valuable papers to the Journal de Savants, and to the "Mémoires" of the Academy of Sciences; and wrote his own "Life." n. at Courtaison, Vaucluse, 1659; p. at Paris, 1737.

SAUSSURE, Horace Benedict de, sau'-sü-ur, a celebrated Swiss naturalist, who received his education at the college of Geneva, of which learned establishment he was appointed professor, in his 22nd year. His life was spent in uninterrupted devotion to physical science, either as a philosopher, writer, or adventurous explorer. This indefatigable philosopher resigned his professorship in 1786, and subsequently became a member of the Council of Two Hundred, and later still, when Geneva was united to the French Republic, a member of the National Assembly. But the Revolution robbed him of nearly all his property, which had been invested in the public funds. Geology, mineralogy, chemistry, electricity, meteorology, were all advanced by the observations of his original and adventurous mind. He was also the inventor of a thermometer for ascertaining the temperature of water at all depths, an electrometer for showing the electrical condition of the atmosphere, and other valuable philosophical apparatus. His most important works were,—"Essays on Hygrometry," "Dissertation Physica de Igne," and "Travels in the Alps," in 4 volumes. n. at Geneva, 1740; p. 1793.

SAUVAGES, François Boissier de, so'-rage', an eminent French physician, who became royal professor of medicine and botany at Montpellier, member of the Royal Society of London, and of several other learned bodies. He was called the Boerhaave of Languedoc, and during thirty years laboured at a work in which he sought to classify diseases in a methodical system. His most important works were "Medical Nosology" (in Latin), "Methodus Foliorum," and a translation of Hale's "Statistical Essays," from the English. n. in Languedoc, 1706; p. 1767.

SAVAL, Henry, so'-ral, an eminent French historian, who, after a laborious study of the archives and maps relating to the city of Paris, produced a learned and voluminous work, entitled "History and Researches relative to Paris." This monument of patient labour and erudition was published after the author's death in 1724, with notes and illustrations by de Launoy, A. Galland, and others. n. at Paris, 1620; p. 1670.

SAUVEUR, Joseph, so'-ru(r), an eminent French mathematician, who was dumb till he was seven years of age, and even then his organs of speech were so imperfect that he was never able to speak distinctly. From an early age he evinced a capacity for the study of mathematics, which he cultivated at the Jesuits' college, Paris, and at the age of 20 had Prince Eugene for a pupil, and in 1686 was appointed mathematical professor of the Royal College. He wrote a "Treatise on Fortification," and another on nautics, besides several papers in the "Mémoires" of the Academy of Sciences. n. at La Flèche, 1653; p. 1716.

SAVAGE, Richard, so'-ajj, an English poet, who was the natural son of the Countess of Macclesfield, by Earl Rivers. This unnatural woman caused him to be brought up without a knowledge of his origin, and framed a story of his death, to prevent his father from leaving him a proper support. After the death of his nurse, he found some papers which disclosed the secret of his birth; but every effort made by him to gain his mother's favour was ineffectual. Having the misfortune to kill a man in a tavern broil, his mother devised every possible means to get him executed; and when he was condemned, she endeavoured to prevent his receiving a royal pardon. His friends, however, procured him a reprieve, and Lord Tyrconnel took him into his family. But the temper and conduct of Savage were most unfortunate; he quarrelled with his patron and pension of £50, which he lost at her death, and was reduced to great distress. Savage had considerable genius, but it was uncultivated. He wrote some plays and poetical pieces, the best of which is the poem entitled 'The Bastard.' Dr. Johnson, who, at the outset of his career, was the companion of the poet's distress, wrote his biography, which is the best piece in the "Lives of the Poets." n. 1698; p. in the debtors' prison, Bristol, 1743.

SAVARIN, Anthelme BRILLAT, sav-va-rin, an eminent French writer upon gastronomy, who at first pursued the profession of an advocate, and was afterwards deputy to the Constituent Assembly, and member of the Court of Cassation. He emigrated to America in 1793, but returned to his native country three years afterwards, and resumed his functions at the Court of Cassation. He produced some minor pieces relative to his profession, but the work which has rendered his name famous is the "Physiologie du Gout," a philosophical treatise upon gastronomy and "good living," abounding in wit and epigram. n. at Bellay, 1755; p. 1826.

SAVARY, Jacques, sav-va-re, a French merchant, who acquired a fortune by commerce, after which he became secretary to the king. He wrote the "Complete Merchant," which passed through many editions. He also had a principal share in the drawing up of the commercial code known as the "Code Savary." n. at Donay, 1622; p. 1690.—His sons, Jacques and Philemon, published their father's work, under the title of a "Universal Dictionary of Commerce."

SAVARY, Nicholas, an eminent French traveller, who, in 1778, went to Egypt, whence he travelled through Greece and the islands of the Archipelago. On his return to France, about 1781, he published the "Koran," translated from the Arabic; "Letters on Egypt," and "Letters on Greece." n. at Vitry, 1750; p. 1783.

SAVARY, Anne Jean Marie, Duke of Rovigo, a celebrated French general, who entered the army in 1789, and in four years became a captain. At the battle of Marengo, in 1800, he was aide-de-camp to General Desaix, and, upon the death of that commander, was attached to the person of Bonaparte in the same capacity. In 1802 the first consul appointed him head of the secret police, and while holding that post, he had the superintendence of the Duke d'Enghien's execution. In 1805 he was created general of division, and, after distinguishing himself at Austerlitz, Eylau, Ostrolenka, and Friedland, he received the title of duke of Rovigo, and was nominated governor of Prussia. He was, in 1808, appointed to the command-in-chief of the army of Spain, and retained it until the arrival of Joseph Bonaparte. In 1810 he succeeded the duke of Otranto as minister-general of police, and although he failed to discover the plot of General Mallet before it had almost attained to maturity, he succeeded in justifying himself with the emperor, who, on hearing of the conspiracy, had hastily returned from Russia. In 1815 his devotion to the fortunes of Napoleon caused him to follow the deposed potentate to Rochefort, and he even requested to be allowed to accompany him to St. Helena, but was refused permission by the British Government. His unpopularity with his countrymen was very great, and he only emerged from obscurity on two subsequent occasions—in 1823, when he attempted to vindicate his conduct in the execution of the Duke d'Enghien, but only drew upon himself greater discredit, before which he was compelled to leave France; and again in 1831-33, when he held the command in Algeria. n. at Mans, 1774; p. 1833.

SAVILLE, George. (See HALIFAX, Marquis of.) SAVILE, Sir Henry, sav-il, a learned English mathematician, who became fellow and warden of Merton College, Oxford, and provost of Eton college. James I., on his accession, conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He was a munificent patron of learning, and founded two professorships at Oxford, one of astronomy and the other of geometry. He published editions of St. Chrysostom's works, translated part of Tacitus, and wrote a "Treatise on Military Affairs, or the Roman Warfare," &c. n. near Halifax, 1549; p. at Eton, 1622.

SAVILLE, Sir George, a public-spirited and patriotic English senator, who distinguished himself by his opposition to the American war, and by bringing in the bill for repealing the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics, for which his house was destroyed in the memorable riots of June, 1780. n. 1725; p. 1784.

SAVONAROLA, sav-va-ro-la, an Italian monk, of the order of Dominicans, who became a celebrated preacher at Florence, where he publicly declaimed against the vices of the priests and the corruptions of the Roman church, for which he was excommunicated by the pope, and condemned to the flames, which sentence was executed in 1493. He wrote Sermons, a treatise entitled "The Triumph of the Cross," and other works. n. at Ferrara, 1452.

SAXE, Marshal, sax, (Count Maurice of Saxony), was the natural son of Frederick Augustus I., elector of Saxony and king of Poland, and of the Countess of Königsmark. From his childhood he evinced proofs of a martial spirit. In 1709 he served with Prince Eugene and Marlborough in the Netherlands. He next displayed great valour under his father, in the war against the Swedes, particularly at the siege of Stralsund. In 1717 he was with Prince Eugene in Hungary, where he raised the siege of Belgrade, and contributed to the defeat of the Turks. After the peace of Utrecht he went to France, where the Duke of Orleans, at that time regent, gave him the rank of maréchal-de-camp. Having obtained a regiment, he employed himself in improving military tactics, and introducing a new system of manœuvres. In 1726 the States of Courland elected him their sovereign, on which Poland and Russia joined against him, and, after a brave defence, the Count was obliged to quit the government and the country. He then returned to France, applied himself to the study of mathematics, and wrote his "Reveries." On the death of his father, in 1733, war was re-kindled between France and Austria, and the elector of Saxony, his brother, offered him the command of his forces, which he declined, giving the preference to the French service. He then joined Marshal the duke of Berwick on the Rhine, and displayed great skill and bravery at the siege of Philippsburg, for which he was made lieutenant-general. In 1741 the Count took Prague, which was followed by the capture of Egra. In 1744 he was made marshal of France, and command-in-chief in Flanders. The next year he gained the battle of Fontenoy, though he was so ill as to be carried on a litter. This victory was followed by the fall of Frederick's strong towns, particularly Brussels. In 1746 he gained the battle of Rocoux, and the same year was appointed marshal of all the French armies, governor of all the places conquered in the Low Countries, and loaded with honours by Louis XV. Marshal Saxe was a ripe and good soldier both theoretically and practically, though his literary acquirements were of a mean order; but his work upon military matters nevertheless contains much that is valuable. It was translated into English by Sir William Fawcett, under the title of "The Reveries, or Memoirs upon the Art of War, by Field-Marshal Count Saxe." He was a man of great size and extraordinary personal strength—one of his feats was the breaking in two of a French coin of about an equal size with an English crown-piece. n. at Dresden, 1696; n. in France, 1750.

SAXO, sax-o, surnamed "Grammaticus," a Danish historian, who went to Paris in 1177, and became a member of the religious order of St. Gervaise. He wrote the "History of the Northern Nations," founded upon the popular traditions; the "Icelandic Sagas," and the "Songs of the Sealds." n. in Denmark; n. about 1204.

SAX, Jean Baptiste, sai, an eminent French writer upon political economy, who was among the first to popularize that study in his native country. His chief works were, a Treatise and a Catechism of Political Economy, and "Letters to Malthus upon various Questions in Political Economy." n. at Lyons, 1797; n. at Paris, 1832.

SCÆVOLA. (See MOTIUS.)

SCALA, Bartolomeo, skål-la, an Italian statesman, who was held in great esteem by Cosmo, duke of Tuscany, and obtained several honorable appointments in his native country. He wrote a "History of Florence" in Latin, "Letters," and other works. n. at Florence, about 1430; n. 1497.

SCALIGER, Julius Cesar, skål-ej-er, a learned Italian writer, who in his youth became page to the emperor Maximilian, and afterwards served in the army, which he quitted to study Greek and Latin, and the science of medicine. He accompanied the bishop of Agen to France, as physician, in 1525, and remained there till his death. He was a man of extraordinary acquirements, both in science and in the learned languages; but it is as a commentator upon the Greek and Latin writers that he is chiefly known. His most important works were a "Treatise on the Art of Poetry," "Exercitationes against Cardan," "Commentaries on Aristotle's History of Animals," "Notes, Dissertations, and Commentaries upon the Greek and Latin Classics," and Latin poems. n. in Italy, 1484; n. at Agen, 1558.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, a distinguished French scholar, and son of the preceding, studied at the college of Bordeaux, and afterwards at Paris. Becoming a Calvinist, he, in 1593, removed to Leyden, and obtained a professorship. Scaliger was a man of the most extensive learning, but petulant and illiberal. His principal works are, "De Emendatione Temporum," in which he established a sound system of chronology, Latin epistles, commentaries, and annotations upon ancient classics, and Latin poems. n. at Agen, France, 1549; n. at Leyden, 1609.

SCAMOZZI, Vincent, skam-ot-ze, a celebrated Italian architect, whose principal works are at Venice, and the most remarkable is the citadel of Palma. He composed a treatise on his art, of great merit, entitled "Architettura Universale." This work was to have consisted of ten books, but six only were completed, which were published just before his death. n. at Vicenza, 1552; n. at Venice, 1616.

SCANDER-BEG, or GEORGE CASTRIOTA, skan-der-beg, a prince of Albania, who was given by his father, John Castriota, with his three brothers, as hostages to Amurath II., who caused him to be educated as a Mussulman, and placed him in command of 5000 cavalry. On the death of his father in 1432, he formed the design of recovering the throne of his ancestors; and being sent against Hunarez, he entered into a secret treaty with Hamdiac Corvinus, king of that country, seized the sultan's secretary, and compelled him to write and seal an order to the governor of Albania, commanding him to deliver the capital to Scander-beg. He then repaired thither, and ascended the throne in 1443. Amurath laid siege to Croia, the capital of Albania, but was twice defeated. The war was continued by his successor, Mahomet II., till 1461, when the independence of the country was settled by treaty. Scander-beg afterwards went to Italy, to assist Ferdinand, king of Aragon, who was closely besieged in Bari. The Albanian hero relieved the place, and contributed to the defeat of the Comte d'Anjou. n. 1441; n. in Venetia, 1467.

SCAPULA, Jean, skap-ool, a learned lexicographer, who completed his education at Lausanne, after which he was employed in the printing-office of Henri Stephens, at Paris. While engaged in correcting the famous "Thesaurus Lingue Græcæ," Scapula made a serious abridgment, which was printed in 1579, under the title of a Greek Lexicon, and proved the ruin of Stephens, whose work was extensive. n. probably at Lausanne; n. at Paris, about 1615.

SCARLATTI, Alexander, scar-lat-te, an eminent Italian composer, who was the founder of the Neapolitan school of music. He is said to have written two hundred masses, a hundred operas, and three thousand cantatas. His writings, although they produced a revolution in the style of operatic music, are almost all completely forgotten. n. at Naples, 1659; n. in Sweden, 1725.

SCARLATTI, Domenico, an eminent Italian composer, and the son of the preceding, who made the acquaintance, at Venice, of Handel, to whom he was ardently attached, and followed to Rome. In 1735 he was appointed master of the royal chapel at Madrid, and teacher to the queen of Spain. He wrote several operas, and pieces for the harp, lute, which were once highly popular. n. 1684; n. 1757.

SCARPA, Antonio, skarp-ah, a celebrated Italian physician and writer upon a medicine, was born of parents in very humble circumstances, but was, through the liberality of a distant relation, enabled to pursue his studies at the university of Padua, where he distinguished himself by his assiduity. In 1772 he was invited to hold the professorship of anatomy at the university of Modena, and subsequently became surgeon-in-chief to the military hospital of the same city. After visiting France and England, in both of which countries he made the acquaintance of the most illustrious physicians of the time, he, in 1783, became professor of anatomy in the university of Pavia. In 1814 he was appointed director of the Medical Faculty of Pavia. A simple enumeration of the titles of the various works of this great physician would occupy almost a column of this dictionary; but there was not one of them that had not a practical value. He wrote upon the anatomy of the organs of smell; of hearing; upon the cure of aneurism, hernia, the diseases of the eye; on the operation for the stone; and decided in the affirmative the question whether the heart was supplied with nerves, a disputed point until his time. Indeed there was scarcely a department of medical science which did not engross his attention or was not illuminated by his valuable writings. b. at La Motta, Friuli, 1749; d. at Pavia, 1832.

SCARRON, Paul, shar'-rawng, a celebrated French burlesque writer, who, in order to propitiate his father, a wealthy counsellor of the Parliament, entered into the ecclesiastical state, and obtained a canonry at Mans; but his conduct was characterized by the utmost license. Once during the carnival, he and three of his companions daubed their bodies with honey, and afterwards rolled in feathers. Thus plumed, they went forth; but the people attacked them, and, to escape from their assailants, they hid themselves in the rushes on the banks of the river Sarthe. Scarron alone survived the cold and exposure to which the unfeathered bipeds had been subjected, but at the cost of remaining a cripple for life. He subsequently removed to Paris, where he found employment as a playwright, and obtained a pension of 500 crowns from Anne of Austria. In 1652 he married Mademoiselle d'Aubigné, afterwards the famous Madame de Maintenon; and thenceforth he passed his days as the head of a witty and brilliant society which made his home its rendezvous. Scarron, who was a man of infinite humour, maintained his cheerfulness, and indeed made a joke of his sufferings, throughout his life. He wrote a number of comedies, a travesty of Virgil's "Æneid," several poems, and the "Roman Comique," which has been translated into English by Oliver Goldsmith. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, 1780. b. at Paris, about 1610; d. 1660.

SCHADOW, Johann Gottfried, sha'-dou, an eminent German sculptor, who studied at Rome, and, upon returning to Berlin in 1788, obtained ample employment. His finest works are, the monument to Count von der Mark; the equestrian statues of Frederick the Great and of Field-Marshal Blücher; and the sculpture on the Mint at Berlin. He was professor, and afterwards director, of the Academy of the Fine Arts at Berlin. His writings upon art were valuable; the most important of them being, "Polyklet, or the Groups of Mankind, according to their Races and Periods;" and "National Physiognomy, or Observations upon the Distinction of the Features, and of the External Form of Human Heads." b. at Berlin, 1764; d. at the same city, 1850.—Two of his sons, Rudolph and Frederick William, became distinguished as artists; the first as a sculptor, and the latter as an historical painter. Rudolph d. at Rome, in his 37th year, 1823.

SCHAECKEN, Godfrey, shai'-ken, an eminent Dutch painter, who was a disciple of Gerard Douw, and resided for some time in London, where he painted a remarkable portrait of

SCHAMYL, sha'-mil, the prophet and supreme military chieftain of the Circassians, who commenced his warlike career in 1824, by ardently browning himself into the struggle which Kasi-Mollah, the supreme chief of his country at that period, had commenced against the Russians. Until the year 1831 the Circassians successfully maintained themselves against their enemies; but at that date General Rosen, with a formidable army, drove them from all their positions, and besieged them in the stronghold of Himry, in the north of Daghestan, which place was taken, though with great loss to the Russians. Kasi-Mollah and nearly all his followers perished, and Schamyl was left for dead upon the sanguinary field. When he re-appeared, it was thought he had risen from death, and he found his fellow-countrymen acting under another chief, whose commands he himself prepared to obey implicitly. This chief was, however, shortly afterwards slain with all his body-guard, except Schamyl, who once more escaped as if by a miracle. From this time he came to be regarded as their born leader by the Circassians, who, moreover, so great was his character for piety, began to look upon him as a prophet. In 1836 he proclaimed holy war against the Russians, which he sustained during nearly a quarter of a century, keeping large armies in check with a mere handful of men, defending step by step his native fastnesses, and, by a mixture of skill and audacity, drawing his antagonists into ambushes, or compelling them to beat disastrous retreats. In 1859, however, he found himself deserted by many of the native chieftains, whose co-operation was necessary to enable him to maintain the struggle against the power and resources of Russia. He and his son were taken prisoners, and Russia became mistress of a territory which she had so long coveted, and for which she had lavished so much blood and treasure. Schamyl might be termed not alone the Abd-el-Kader, but also the Mohammed of the Caucasus. b. at the village of Himry, Daghestan, 1797.

SCHANZ, John, shank, a naval officer, entered the service early in life, and distinguished himself on the Canadian lakes during the American war, as an able engineer. After the peace, he devoted himself chiefly to the improvement of shipping, and, among other contrivances, invented one for navigating vessels in shallow water, by means of sliding keels. He was employed in the defence of the British coast, and in the transport service during the war with France, and became admiral of the Blue in 1821. He was one of the first founders of the Society for Promoting Naval Architecture, and wrote several valuable papers for the institution. b. in Fifeshire, 1740; d. 1823.

SCHÉELE, Charles William, shai'-le(r), a celebrated Prussian chemist, who was at first an apprentice and assistant to an apothecary at Gothenburg, but afterwards set up in business on his own account at Upsal. With the exception of Priestley, no person made so many discoveries in chemistry as Scheele. He made known oxygen gas, chlorine, tartaric acid, fluoric acid, barytes, and the arsenite of copper, or mineral green, &c.; he was also one of the founders of organic chemistry. His treatises and memoirs, contributed to the "Transactions" of the Royal Academy of Stockholm, of which he was a member, were republished under the title of "Collection of Researches made by C.W. Scheele into Natural Philosophy and Chemistry," Berlin, 1793. Another important work of his was "Chemical Observations and Experiments on Air and Fire." n. at Stralsund, Pomerania, 1742; n. at Köping, near Stockholm, 1786.

SCHCEEMAKERS, Peter, shai'-ma-kers, an eminent Flemish sculptor, who took up his residence in England, and became the rival of Doubiliac and Rysbrack. His best works are the monuments to Shakspeare, Dryden, and the duke of Albemarle, in Westminster Abbey; and the bronze statue of Guy in Guy's Hospital; and those of Major Lawrence and Lord Clive in the old India House. In 1770 he returned to Antwerp. n. at Antwerp, 1691; n. about 1773.

SCHIEFFER, Ary, shief'-fer, an eminent French historical painter, who, after studying in Holland, went to Paris, where he finished his artistic education under Baron Guérin. In 1812 he exhibited his first picture at the Paris Exhibition, and from that time rose rapidly to the highest position both as an historical and genre painter. His manner partook of the lofty and grand character of the modern German, combined with a certain Gallic style of and effect. As a portrait painter he was eminently successful, his best works in account of which was given to the German public in a work entitled "Essay upon the Difference in the Systems of Schelling and Fichte." In time these new philosophical ideas superseded those of Fichte, just as Schelling's theories were at a later period supplanted by the Hegelian philosophy. In 1841 he became professor at the university of Berlin, in which city he continued to reside until his death. His most important works were—"On the System of Transcendental Idealism;" "Discourse on the Philosophy of Art" (translated into English); and "The Philosophy of Nature." n. at Leonberg, Württemberg, 1775; n. at Berlin, 1851.

SCILLER, Frederick, shil'-ler, a celebrated German poet and dramatist, who was the son of an army surgeon, and at first studied the law, which he exchanged for medicine, and, after taking his degree, became physician to a regiment stationed at Stuttgart. Meanwhile his leisure had been given to the study of the poets and dramatists of England and Germany; and in secret he composed his tragedy of "The Robbers," which was produced at Mannheim in 1782. The tragedy obtained an immense success; but the author having ventured to go without leave to the theatre at Mannheim, he was for that offence put under arrest. Soon 1856; Talleyrand, Lamartine, and the ex-queen of the French. Many of his finest productions have been made familiar to the English public through the medium of the engraver's art; as for example, the reproductions of his "Faust," "Mignon," "Francesca da Rimini and her Lover meeting Dante and Virgil in Hell," and Byron's "Giaour." He was an officer of the Legion of Honour, and received many other acknowledgments from the different continental governments of his genius as an artist. n. 1795; d. 1858.

SCHIEFFER, Arnold, a modern French writer, and brother of the preceding, who produced a "History of Germany," "The English Nation and Government," and other historical works. As a political writer, he was one of the most determined opponents of the government of Louis Philippe. n. 1796; d. 1853.

SCHIEFFER, Henry, a modern French painter, and brother of the preceding, who became chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and produced some fine works, the best of which were, "Joan of Arc" and "Charlotte."

SCHILLING, Frederick Augustus, schil'-ling, a German novelist, who at first served in the army, and attained the grade of captain of artillery in 1807, but retired shortly afterwards, and took up his residence at Dresden, where he composed a great number of romances which were highly popular in Germany. He also wrote a drama entitled "Elise de Lohmar." n. at Dresden, 1766; n. at the same city, 1839.

SCHILLING, Frederick William Joseph, an eminent German metaphysician, who succeeded Fichte as professor of philosophy in the university of Jena. At first an ardent advocate of the theories of the latter philosopher, he gradually drew away from them, until, in 1802, he established a new set of philosophical ideas, an wards to Dresden, and in 1789 settled at Jena, where he had been appointed professor of history. It was here that he married and wrote his "History of the Thirty Years' War," and some essays upon the Kantian philosophy. In 1790 he produced his play of "Wallenstein," well known to the English reader through the fine translation by Coleridge. Shortly afterwards he once more changed his abode, and went to Weimar, where he became the intimate friend of Goethe, and his fellow-superintendent of the theatre there. His "Mary Stuart" appeared in 1800; and in the following year "The Maid of Orleans." "The Bride of Messina" was produced in 1803, with less success than his previous work; but "William Tell," which came out in the following year, redeemed the comparative failure of its predecessor. Of this play, Carlyle says, it "is one of Schiller's very finest dramas; it exhibits some of the highest triumphs which his genius, combined with his art, ever realized." In 1805 he was attacked by a fatal illness. As his end approached, he was plain to him." His poems of the lyrical order have always been held in the most enthusiastic admiration in Germany, where they are quoted by every one. These compositions are also more popular in England than the dramas, which fall immeasurably short of the works of the greatest English poets; but, although they contain many defects—principally of construction, or imperfectly-defined individuality of character—they are so full of the finest spirit of poetry, so redolent of the most exalted sentiments, that they are worthy of the honour in which Germany holds them. A translation of the lyrical poems and ballads of Schiller has been made by Lord Lytton, Sir John Bowring, and others. His plays have also been re-produced in an English form by various authors. B. at Marbach, 1759; d. at Weimar, 1805.

SCHIMMELPENNINCK, Rutger John, shim'-mel-pen-nink, an eminent Dutch statesman, who was educated for, and exercised the profession of advocate, and in 1785-86 played a distinguished part in the efforts made by the United Provinces to accomplish a wise and moderate revolution. In 1795 he displayed great eloquence at the National Batavian Convention. He was afterwards ambassador at Paris, plenipotentiary at the congress of Amiens (1802), and finally ambassador at London. For fifteen months (in 1805-6) he governed Holland with the greatest success as grand-pensionary. During the reign of Louis Bonaparte, Schimmelpenninck lived in retirement, but was nevertheless frequently consulted on matters of state. When Holland was incorporated with the empire, he became a member of the "Sénate Conservateur" of France. B. 1761; d. 1825.

SCHLEGEL, John Elias, shlai'-gel, a German writer, who became professor of modern history at the academy of Soroe. He wrote some dramas, and a number of poetical pieces of merit. B. at Meissen, 1718; d. at Soroe, 1749.—His two brothers, John Adolphus and John Heinrich, also distinguished themselves in literature.

SCHLEGEL, Augustus William von, a celebrated German poet and critic, studied at Göttingen under Heyne, who had so high an opinion of his classical attainments that he allowed him to make an index to his edition of "Virgil." He was afterwards a lecturer at the same university, and commenced his poetical career with some poems and translations of Dante, which secured him a high place among the writers of his country. He began his celebrated translation of Shakspeare in 1797, and, in the same year, was appointed to a professorship at Jena. In 1805 he became acquainted with Madame de Staël-Holstein, whom he accompanied upon a journey through several countries. The influence of this learned and cultivated lady upon his mode of thought was very great, and it was through her writings that he became known in France. In 1808 he commenced the delivery of his famous lectures on dramatic art; having previously produced some poems and criticisms upon the literature and fine arts, which were received with applause. After the occupation of Paris he went to reside at the country seat of Madame de Staël, and remained with her until her death in 1818. In the following year he was nominated professor of history in the university of Bonn, and, after devoting himself assiduously to the study of Sanskrit, he established, at his own cost, a printing-office at Bonn, for the production of works in that ancient language. He also founded a Review for the discussion of Indian literature; and gave Latin translations of the "Ramayana" and the "Bhagavad-Gita," two classics of the Sanskrit tongue. His last work was his "Essays, Literary and Historical," which appeared in 1842. The most important works of this distinguished scholar, critic, and poet, were, "Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature," a translation of which forms a volume of Bohn's Standard Library; the translation of "Shakspeare," an edition of the "Niebelungen;" and a collection of poems. B. at Hanover, 1707; d. at Bonn, 1845.

SCHLEGEL, Frederick Charles William von, distinguished German critic, philosopher, and

philologist, was the younger brother of the preceding, and was designed for commercial pursuits; but his disposition was so strongly inclined towards literature, that his father sent him to the university of Göttingen, where he devoted himself to the study of philology. He afterwards went to Leipzig, and in 1793 produced a portion of a "History of Greece and Rome," as well as a fragment of a German translation of Plato. He had been previously engaged with his brother in editing a literary journal called the "Athenæum," the influence of which print upon the contemporary literature of Germany was enormous, although the paper did not appear after the conclusion of the third volume. His next great undertaking was the delivering of a course of lectures upon philosophy at Jena, in 1800; his tragedy of "Alarkas," appeared two years later; and in 1803 he produced a fine work upon the literature of India. Some excellent poems followed in the course of the two subsequent years. In 1809 he was appointed Imperial secretary to the Archduke Charles, and while holding that office, produced a series of proclamations against France, of the most patriotic and spirit-stirring character. His later years were chiefly spent as a diplomatic official under Metternich, who was his constant patron, as the editor of some Vienna periodicals, or in the composition and delivering of lectures upon modern history, ancient and modern literature, and the philosophy of history and of language. Translations of many of his lectures upon the philosophy of history, life, language, and literature, were published in 4 volumes of Bohn's Standard Library. A complete edition of his works, in 15 volumes, was produced at Vienna. B. at Hanover, 1772; d. 1829.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Frederick Ernest Daniel, sh'-er-ma'-ker, a celebrated German theologian and philologist, who received his earliest education under the Moravians, his parents having belonged to that religious sect; but at 18 he quitted that body, and went to the university of Halle, where he devoted himself with the utmost assiduity to theology and philology. In 1790 he was engaged as tutor in the family of a nobleman, after which he became a preacher at Berlin. While thus engaged, he assisted in producing a German translation of Blair's Sermons, and those of Fawcett also. His first original works were some contributions to the "Athenæum," a literary paper conducted by the brothers Schlegel. After a distinguished career as a preacher, and as commentator upon the ancient classics, he was, in 1802, appointed professor of theology and philosophy in the university of Halle. When, in 1806, Halle was incorporated in the new kingdom of Westphalia, he repaired to Berlin, where he was engaged in delivering lectures upon theological questions; and never lost an opportunity to denounce from his pulpit the French oppressors of Prussia. He was subsequently nominated to the chair of theology in the Berlin University, which he retained with a constantly increasing reputation until his death. Schleiermacher was distinguished no less for his oratorical powers than for his profound erudition. He produced the best translation of Plato, a series of eloquent discourses on religion, and a variety of learned works, embracing philology, philosophy, and classical criticism. B. at Breslau, 1768; d. at Berlin, 1834.

Schlosser

SCHLOSSER, Frederick Christopher, shlos'-ser, an eminent German historian, who concluded his education at the university of Göttingen, after which he became private tutor in a nobleman's family, and, later, a school teacher. But he devoted all his leisure to the study of history, in which he had greatly distinguished himself while a student, and in 1812 gave to the world his "History of the Iconoclast Emperors," which enhanced his reputation for learning, and also gained for him the appointment of professor in the Lyceum at Frankfort. In 1817 he obtained the professorship of history at Heidelberg. Between the years 1823-46 he published his great work entitled "The History of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries." "A History of the Ancient World and its Civilization," "Critical Examination of Napoleon," and some minor historical pieces, were his latest works. His "History of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries" has been translated into English. b. at Jever, in the lordship of Kniphausen, 1776; d. 1861.

SCHLÖZER, Augustus Ludwig von, shlo'-zer, an eminent German historian and political writer, who, after completing his education at Göttingen, became tutor in a Swedish family, and proceeded to Stockholm, where he produced his first work, a "History of Commerce." Having a great proficiency in the Eastern languages, he was offered the post of literary assistant by Müller, the historiographer of the Russian empire. He accepted that offer, and proceeded to St. Petersburg, where he made such rapid progress in the study of the Russian language and history as to excite the jealousy of his superior. He then left Müller, and became a public teacher, and in 1764 was offered a professorship at Göttingen; but Müller succeeded in preventing his obtaining leave to quit Russia. In the following year, however, he was compensated for his enforced residence in Russia by being appointed professor of Russian history in the Academy of St. Petersburg. In 1767 he was permitted to leave the country, and became professor of political science at Göttingen. In 1804 he was raised to noble rank by the emperor of Russia, and created privy councillor of justice. His most important works were "General History of the North," "Picture of the History of Russia," and "Researches into the Fundamental Laws of Russia." He also edited some of the old Russian chronicles. b. at Jagstadt, in the principality of Hohenlohe-Kirchberg, 1737; d. 1809.

SCHNIDER, Conrad Victor, shni'-der, a German physician, who became professor of medicine at Wittenberg, and physician to the elector of Saxony. The membrane lining the cavities of the nose was first described by him, and is called after his name. He wrote a work called "De Catarrhis," in which he refuted some of the old fallacies relative to that disease. b. in Saxony, 1610; d. at Württemberg, 1680.

SCHNEIDER, Johann Gottlieb, a German philologist and naturalist, who, after completing his studies at Leipzig, was engaged by Brunn to assist in producing an edition of the Greek poets. He subsequently devoted himself to the study of the natural sciences, with the view of qualifying himself for the elucidation of the ancient writers upon that department of knowledge. During thirty-four years he held the professorship of philology at the university of Frankfurt, and was finally appointed chief librarian to the same seat of learning after it had been transferred to Breslau. His works were very numerous both in philology and natural history; the most important of them being an edition of Aristotle's "Natural History," a Greek Dictionary, an edition of the works of Xenophon, and several works elucidatory of the natural history of the ancient writers. b. in Saxony, 1750; d. at Breslau, 1822.

SCHNIEDER, Johann Christian Frederick, a distinguished composer, whose father was organist at Watersdorf, and himself superintended the education of his boys. At an early period the son was distinguished, not merely as a pianoforte player, but as a composer; and during the course of his life, though contemporary with Beethoven, Weber, Spohr, and Mendelssohn, took a leading place among the musical authors of Germany. His works include almost every form of musical composition, theatrical writing alone excepted. His oratorios—the works by which he is best known in England—comprise "The Deluge," "Last Judgement," "Paradise Lost," "Pharaoh," "Christ the Master," "Absalom," "Christ the Child," "Gideon," "Gethsemane and Golgotha," besides cantatas, psalms, hymns, and other service music. b. 1786; d. 1853.

SCHNORR, Von Karolsfeld Julius, shnor, an eminent German artist, who received his first instructions in drawing from his father, Hans Schnorr Von Karolsfeld, who was director of the Art Academy at Leipzig. His parent, however, designed him for some other profession; but his earliest efforts were so successful, and the young man evinced so much enthusiasm for art, that he was permitted to follow the bent of his genius. After studying for a time at Vienna, he, in 1815, repaired to Rome, where he became a member of that society of young German painters at whose head were Cornelius and Overbeck. He soon obtained a foremost position in that artistic community, and was engaged with his great compatriots to embellish the walls of the Villa Massimo at Rome with designs in fresco, the subject being chosen from the works of Dante, Ariosto, and Petrarch. Some scriptural works also employed his brush while at Rome; the chief of which were,—"Ruth in the field of Boaz," "Flight into Egypt," and "Jacob and Rachel." When King Louis of Bavaria resolved to embellish Munich with architectural and pictorial masterpieces, Schnorr was invited, with other celebrated German artists, to carry out the royal patron's ideas. In 1827 he was nominated professor of historical painting in the Academy of Fine Arts at Munich. In that city he remained until the year 1846, when he removed to Dresden, on being appointed director of the picture-gallery and professor in the Academy of Fine Arts there. Meanwhile, he had decorated the state apartments of the new palace at Munich with a series of magnificent frescoes illustrative of the history of Charlemagne, Frederick Barbarossa, and Rudolph of Hapsburg, and likewise of the national poem of the "Nibelungen-lid." He also produced some fine designs, which have been engraved on wood, and which exhibit copious and vigorous imaginative power, correct drawing, and an abundant variety of composition and impressive effect. The most important of these wood-blocks are, a series for an edition of the "Nibelungen-lid," another entitled "Die Bibel in Bildern," "Bible Pictures," and finally the extensive series for the edition of the holy writings entitled "Beeton's Illuminated Family Bible." b. at Leipzig, 1794; d. at Dresden, 1853.

SCHNURER, Christian Frederick, shnoor'-er, a learned German orientalist, who produced a "Bibliotheca Arabica," and other important works in theology and in Eastern literature. b. 1742; d. 1822.

SCHÆLCHER, Victor, shel'-sher, a French littérateur and democratic politician, who, after quitting college, joined the ultra party which was opposed to the Restoration. Until the revolution of 1830 he was engaged as a journalist and art critic. He had visited the United States, Mexico, and Cuba, and had returned to France a determined advocate for the abolition of slavery. Devoting himself to that as a special question, he published a number of works thereupon, all of them pleading eloquently for the emancipation of the black populations. Egypt, the coast of Africa, and other parts, were subsequently visited, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the condition of the servile races. In 1843 he returned to Paris, and was at once appointed to a post in the ministry of marine. In that capacity he drew up a proclamation for the immediate emancipation of the black population of the French colonies, and also promulgated a decree by which flogging in the navy was abolished. Subsequently he, as journalist, member of the Legislative Assembly, and vice-president of the "Mountain," or ultra-democratic party, defended the views of that section of French politicians. This line of conduct caused him to become one of the victims of the coup d'état of 1851. Expelled from his native country on that occasion, he repaired to England, where he produced several works, the most important of which was a complete and careful biography of the great musician Handel, which was published in English, having been translated from the author's MS. His writings, chiefly political, are to be found in the columns of the best democratic journals of France, to which he was for a long period an eloquent and enlightened contributor. b. at Paris, 1804.

SCHÖFFER, Peter, shof'-fer, one of the improvers of the art of printing, who appears to have been at first a copyist at Paris, but was afterwards employed in the establishment of Gutenberg and Faust, at Mainz. By one account he is said to have discovered the method of casting metal types. When Faust and Gutenberg separated, in 1455, Schöffler became the partner of the former; after whose death he printed many works alone. His three sons also became eminent as printers. d. about 1502.

SCHOLEFIELD, Rev. James, skole'-feeld, a learned English divine, who received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1815, and in 1825 was elected regius professor of Greek at the same university. His principal works were a new edition of the four tragedies of Euripides, "Hints for an improved translation of the New Testament," and an edition of the New Testament. b. at Hoxley-on-Thames, 1789; d. at Hastings, 1853.

SCHOLZ, Johann Matthias August, sholz, a learned German philologist, who, after completing his studies at the university of Breslau, devoted himself to the production of an improved edition of the text of the New Testament. With this object he visited London, Paris, Vienna, Italy, Egypt, and Palestine. He was professor of theology at Bonn. His most important publications were, "Handbook of Biblical Archaeology;" the text of the New Testament, under the title of "Novum Testamentum Græce;" and an account of his travels in the East. b. near Breslau, 1794; d. 1852.

SCHOMBERG, Armand Frederick de, shom'-airg, a distinguished soldier, who fought under Frederick Henry, prince of Orange, and his son William; but in 1650 passed into the French service, and obtained the governorship of Gravelines and Furnes. In 1681 he was sent to Portugal, where he commanded with such success as to force Spain to make a peace. He rose to the rank of marshal; but, upon the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he left France and went to Brandenburg, the Elector of which made him minister of state. He accompanied the prince of Orange to England at the revolution of 1689; was created a peer, made knight of the Garter, and had a large sum voted him by Parliament. In 1689 he went with William to Ireland, and was shot by mistake, as he was crossing the Boyne, by the French refugees of his own regiment. b. about 1610.

SCHOMBERG, Henry Count de, marshal of France, was descended from a German family, and served in 1617 in Piedmont under Marshal d'Estrées, and afterwards against the Huguenots in the civil wars. In 1625 he was made field-marshal, and, two years afterwards, defeated the English at the Isle of Rhé. In 1632 he defeated the rebels in Languedoc, at the famous battle of Castelnaudary, for which he was made governor of that province. b. at Paris, 1533; d. 1632.

SCHOMBURGK, Sir Robert Hermann, shom'-burg, an eminent modern traveller and naturalist, and the discoverer of the "Victoria regia." In 1835 he undertook an exploratory journey into the interior of Guiana, under the auspices of the Royal Geographical Society, and, while ascending the Berbice river, first met with the magnificent aquatic plant afterwards named the Victoria Regia water-lily. He subsequently published a work of great value upon British Guiana, of which country he was, in 1840, employed to make a survey. For his successful accomplishment of this mission he received the honour of knighthood, and his distinguished services as a traveller and naturalist have been acknowledged by various European courts and learned bodies. In 1840 he was nominated British consul to the republic of St. Domingo. His most important works are, a History of Barbadoes, an account of the peninsula and bay of Samana, in St. Domingo, and the account of British Guiana cited above. b. 1804; d. 1866.

SCHOOLCRAFT, Henry Rowe, skool'-kraft, an eminent American philologist and traveller, whose youth was devoted to the study of the natural sciences and to the acquisition of languages. In 1817 he commenced that career in which he subsequently earned a high reputation, by making a journey of exploration through Missouri; whence he returned to Washington, with a valuable mass of notes and mineralogical specimens. His "Mines and Mineral Resources of Missouri," published in 1819, met with the most decided success, and obtained for its author the post of geologist to the exploring expedition dispatched to the sources of the Mississippi in the following year. The Journal and Report which he produced at the termination of this mission greatly enhanced his reputation. He was chosen to fulfil, in succession, posts of great responsibility and distinction. In 1821 he acted as secretary to an Indian conference at Chicago. In the following year he was acting as agent for Indian affairs in the north-western provinces, and while discharging these duties became acquainted with Miss Johnston, a young lady who had received a high education in Europe, but was the daughter of an Irish gentleman married to the daughter of an Indian chief. From this lady, who became his wife, he received the most valuable assistance in prosecuting that course of research into the languages, traditions, and antiquities of the Indian tribes, which, even from his earliest youth, it had been his ambition to pursue. In 1832 he was charged with the conduct of an expedition to the Upper Mississippi and beyond St. Anthony's Falls. Of that mission he produced an account, in his "Expedition to Itasca Lake," a work in which he showed that he had succeeded in tracing the Mississippi up to its ultimate forks, and to its actual source in Itasca Lake. He was afterwards described as "the only man in America who had seen the Mississippi from its source to its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico." He subsequently acted as commissioner to the Indians for the purchase of territory upon the north-western frontier; as superintendent of Indian affairs; and in capacities of a like nature. In 1841 he took up his residence at New York, afterwards making a philological and archaeological tour in Europe and Canada. At a later period he devoted himself to the task of arranging and publishing his vast stores of information upon Indian language, antiquities, and ethnology, which he had spent thirty years in collecting. An enumeration of several of this learned gentleman's most important publications will afford a notion of the great services he performed relative to the aboriginal history of his native land. His greatest work was entitled "Historical and Statistical Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States;" and of scarcely less value are, "American Indians, their History, Condition, and Prospects;" "Personal Memoirs of a Residence of Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes on the American Frontiers;" "The Myth of Hiawatha, and other Oral Legends of the North-American Indians" (from this work Mr. Longfellow derived the legend of his poem of "Hiawatha"); "A Complete Lexicon of the Algonquin Language, the most primitive and widely-diffused aboriginal language;" and "Algie Researches." Mr. Schoolcraft was a member of the chief European and American literary and learned societies. n. at Hamilton, New York, 1793; d. about 1860.

SCHOREL, John, sho'-rel, a Dutch painter, who studied under Albert Dürer, after which he went to the Holy Land, where he made a large collection of sketches. On his return to Europe, he was appointed by Pope Adrian IV. superintendent of the buildings at Belvedere. He was also a poet and musician. n. at Schoorl, Holland, 1495; d. at Utrecht, 1562.

SCHOTT, Andrew, shot, a learned German classicist, who became professor of elocution at Rome, and afterwards taught Greek at Toledo. He produced, among many other learned works, "Hispania Illustrata," the Lives of Francis Borgia, Ferdinand Ximenez, and also edited several of the Latin classics. n. at Antwerp, 1552; d. at the same city, 1620.

SCHREVELIUS, Cornelius, shre'-vel'-us, a Dutch lexicographer, who published editions of Homer and Hesiod; but his principal work was his "Lexicon," Greek and Latin, which was extensively used in England. n. 1614; d. 1667.

SCHUBERT, Francis, shoo'-hairt, an eminent musical composer, whose melodies, known by their German name, "Lieder," have attained great celebrity throughout Germany, France, and England; among the best known are the "Erl König," "Ave Marie," "Der Wanderer," and "Die Erwartung," &c. n. 1797; d. 1828.

SCHULENBURG, Matthias John, Count, shoo'-len-boorg, a German general, who was first in the Polish service, and, with a small army, repelled several attacks made by the Swedes under Charles XII. In 1708 he was at the battle of Malplague, where his conduct gained him the esteem of Prince Eugene. In 1711 he entered the Venetian service, and compelled the Turks to raise the siege of Corfu. In 1726 he went to England on a visit to his sister, the countess of Kendal, but afterwards returned to Venice. n. near Magdeburg, 1661; d. at Venice, 1747.

SCHULTENS, Albert, shool'-tens, a learned German divine and Orientalist, who became professor of the Oriental languages, first at Franeker and afterwards at Leyden. His principal works are, a "Commentary upon Job," "Commentary on the Proverbs," the "Life of Saladin," translated from the Arabic; a Hebrew and an Arabic Grammar. n. at Groningen, 1686; d. at Leyden, 1750.—His son John Jacob was also a learned professor, and succeeded him in the chair of Oriental languages at Leyden. His grandson, Henry Albert, became professor of Oriental languages at Amsterdam, and produced a Latin translation of the fables of Pithagoras, and other learned works. n. 1743.

SCHULTZ, Benjamin, shooltz, a learned German philologist, who produced, among other important works, one in German, entitled "The Master of the Eastern and Western Languages," which contained one hundred alphabets. n. 1761; d. 1833.

SCHUMACHER, Henry Christian, shoo'-na-ker, an eminent modern Dutch astronomer, who was selected by the Danish government to measure the degrees of longitude from Copenhagen to the west coast of Jutland, and in 1821 was appointed by the Royal Scientific Society of Copenhagen to direct the survey of Holstein and Lauenburg. He was subsequently engaged, in conjunction with the English Board of Longitude, in ascertaining the differences between the observatories of Greenwich and Altona. His after-life was spent as astronomer to the king of Denmark. He published many valuable works upon the science to which he devoted himself. n. 1780; d. at Altona, 1860.

SCHUMANN, Robert, shoo'-man, a German musical composer, whose works are very popular in his native country; but the only production by him which became successful in England, was a cantata entitled "Paradise and the Peri," the words of which were translated from Moore's poem. n. in Germany, about 1815; d. 1856.

SCHURMANN, Anna Maria de, shoor'-man, a learned German lady, who understood Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and was acquainted with several modern languages. She applied herself to music, painting, and engraving with great success, and her penmanship was remarkable for its beauty. In 1680 she became a disciple of the enthusiast Labadie, after whose death she retired from the world. Her "Opuscula," or pieces in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, were printed in 1682. She also wrote Latin poems, and a "Defence of Female Study." B. at Cologne, 1607; D. 1678.

SCHWANTHALER, Louis Michael, schaw an eminent German sculptor, whose ancestors had been of the same profession during some generations. He received his artistic education at the Munich Academy of the Fine Arts, and subsequently repaired to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Thorwaldsen, who aided him with some valuable advice. His first successes in his profession were due to the patronage of King Louis of Bavaria, who employed the young sculptor in carving a statue of Shakspeare for the theatre at Munich, and afterwards in executing the sculpturesque decorations for the fine architectural works with which that art-loving monarch was adorning his capital city. He continued to labour with unceasing zeal until he became the acknowledged head of the Munich school of sculpture. In 1835 he was appointed professor of sculpture; but although his health began to decline about this time, his energy was scarcely less ardent than formerly. His grandest work was the colossal statue of Bavaria which occupies the centre of the Bavarian Hall of Fame, and is about sixty feet in height. His colossal statues of St. Peter, St. Paul, Count Tilly, and monumental statues of Göthe, Jean Paul Richter, and Mozart, are noble productions. The new palace of King Louis of Bavaria, the Walhalla of Ratisbon, and, indeed, many of the finest art-collections throughout Germany and England, are enriched by his splendid works. At his death he bequeathed his studio, together with models of his most important works, to the Fine Arts Academy of Munich; and in the same city there is a street named in his honour. Casts of the head of his "Bavaria," of the "Shield of Hercules," and of other of his productions, are contained in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. B. at Munich, 1802; D. at the same city, 1848.

SCHWARTZ, Berthold, shwartz, a German monk, who is said to have been of the order of the Cordeliers. According to one statement, he was the discoverer of gunpowder, which he obtained while making some experiments with sulphur, charcoal, and saltpetre. Another account gives to Roger Bacon the discovery; but the compound appears, in reality, to have been known at a more remote date. Schwartz lived about the beginning of the 14th century.

SCHWARTZ, Christian Frederick, an eminent Prussian missionary, who, in 1750, left London for the East Indies, where, during almost half a century, he laboured zealously in the conversion of the Hindoos to Christianity. He earned and received the warm support of the British throughout his honourable career, and when, in 1787, the rajah of Tanjore was dying, he intrusted to him his youthful successor, saying, "He is not my son, but yours: into your hands I deliver him." Bishop Heber spoke of Schwartz as an "extraordinary man;" and, at his death, the East India directors erected a monument to his memory in St. Mary's Church, at Madras. B. in Prussia, 1726; D. in the East Indies, 1798.

SCHWARTZENBERG, Charles Philip, Prince von, shwartz-en-bairg, an Austrian general, whose signal services in the campaigns against the Turks in 1789, and in the subsequent engagements with the armies of the French republic, gained for him, in 1797, the rank of major-general. In 1799 he raised a regiment of Hulus at his own expense; and afterwards fought at Hohenlinden, at Austerlitz, and at Wagram. When Napoleon I. invaded Russia, in 1812, Schwarzenberg commanded the auxiliary force of Austria, then an ally of France; but showed so much reluctance to obey the orders of the French emperor, that strong representations were on that account made to his monarch. Shortly afterwards he was appointed to the command-in-chief of the armies allied against Napoleon, and was present at the battle of Leipzig, where the French army was almost annihilated. In 1814 he entered France, and marched into Paris upon the capitulation of the city by Marmont. His subsequent career was less active: but he was loaded with honours by the emperor of Austria. At his death he was a field-marshal of the Austrian army. B. at Vienna, 1771; D. 1820.

SCHWEIGHŒUSER, Jean, shwé-gai-oo'-ser, a learned French philologist, who was professor in Arabic, Syriac, Hebrew, and other languages, the knowledge of which he gained in his native country, in England, and in Germany. He was appointed professor of philosophy at Strasburg in 1770, and was subsequently chosen to occupy the chair of Greek. He produced editions of Suidas, Herodotus, Seneca, and Epictetus. B. at Strasburg, 1742; D. 1830.

SCHWENCKFELD, Gaspar von, shwenk'-felt, a German divine, who founded a sect which still exists in small numbers in Silesia. He was one of the first followers of Luther, but subsequently separated from him, and commenced preaching some entirely new doctrines. He declared that the Scriptures were not to be held as inspired, and that mankind should wait, without discussion, until the true revelations should emanate from heaven. He likewise wrote in favour of the reuniting of the Roman Catholics and the followers of the reformed doctrines. He wrote upwards of eighty dissertations upon theology. B. in Silesia, 1490; D. at Ulm, 1661.

SCHWEIN, Christopher, Count, schwein'-in, a general and field-marshal in the Prussian service, entered the army at an early age, and distinguished himself on many occasions. In 1741 he gained the battle of Molwitz at the moment when the Prussians thought themselves lost. The king of Prussia erected a statue in his honour, as did the emperor of Germany a monument on the spot where he was slain. B. 1684; killed at the battle of Prague, 1757.

SCIOPIRUS, Caspar, si-op'-pi-us, a learned German philologist, who wrote an abusive satire on the pretensions of Joseph Scaliger to be considered of noble descent, and attacked James I. of England and the Jesuits with great asperity. At the close of his life he employed himself in explaining the Apocalypse. His learning was extensive and profound, and he produced more than a hundred works upon the authors of antiquity. B. in the Palatinate, 1576; D. 1649.

have made his first campaign at the age of 17, under his father, and to have saved his parent's life at the battle of the Ticinus, b.c. 213. After the battle of Cannæ, he prevented the Roman youth from abandoning their country as they had intended, out of despair of saving it. Scipio was elected edile at the age of 21. His father and uncle having fallen in battle, he obtained the command in Spain, where he defeated the enemy and took New Carthage. He put an end to the war in that country by a decisive battle, and then crossed over into Africa, where he defeated Hasdrubal and Syphax, b.c. 203. He afterwards gained the battle of Zama, which victory produced peace between Rome and Carthage. Scipio obtained a triumph and the appellation of Africanus for these brilliant services. He was also twice honoured with the consular dignity; but envy of his glory brought upon him a charge of taking bribes. Scipio appeared before the people; and only saved himself by recalling to them his victory at Zama. The affair, however, was again brought before the tribunes; but he had retired to his villa near Liternum, where he continued to reside until his death. The virtues and generosity of Scipio, especially to his captives, were as distinguished as his valour and prudence; while, as a general, he was only second to Hannibal. b. 235 b.c.; d. about 183 b.c.

Scipio, Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Asiaticus, brother of the preceding, with whom he served in Spain and Africa. In reward of his services, he obtained the consulate, b.c. 190. He afterwards conducted the war in Asia against Antiochus, over whom he gained a great victory on the plains of Magnesia. For this he was honoured with a triumph and the appellation of Asiaticus. Cato the censor, however, preferred a charge against him of peculation, and his estates were sold to pay the supposed debt he owed to the republic.

Scipio, Publius Æmilianus, was the son of Æmilius Paulus, and adopted by the son of Scipio Africanus. He was called Africanus the Younger, in consequence of his victories over the Carthaginians. He served the office of edile, and afterwards of consul, in which capacity he laid siege to, and succeeded in taking Carthage, b.c. 146, which, according to a decree of the senate, was razed to the ground. For this he was chosen consul a second time, and took Numantia, b.c. 133, whence he acquired the surname of Numantinus. He was assassinated in his bed, b.c. 129, as is supposed by the direction of the triumphs, who suspected him of aspiring to the dictatorship.

Scipio Nasica was the cousin of the preceding, whom he defended with great eloquence before the people. He was refused the consulship at first, but afterwards obtained that dignity. In 171 b.c. he pleaded the cause of the Spanish people against their Roman governors before the senate.

Scipio, Metellus, father-in-law of Pompey. After the battle of Pharsalia, he retired to Africa with the remains of the vanquished army, and having joined the troops of Juba, king of Mauritania, was for some time successful; but was ultimately defeated by Cæsar at Thapsus, and fell in battle.

Scipio, skai'-ter, an English divine, who wrote elegies and epitaphs, under the title of "Threnodia Britannica;" "Palm-Albion; or, the History of Great Britain to the reign of James I.," folio, in Latin and English verse; and a genealogy of James I. from Adam. d. in Kent, 1617.

Scoras, sko'-pas, an architect and sculptor of the isle of Paros, who built the famous mausoleum for Artemisia, in honour of her husband; but his chief work was a statue of Venus, which was esteemed as equal to that of Praxiteles. Lived about 350 b.c.

Scouras, William, skors'-be, an Arctic navigator and whaling captain, who was the son of a small farmer in Yorkshire, and himself followed agricultural occupations until he had reached early manhood, when he determined to pursue a seafaring life. In 1750 he sailed from Whitby; but, having excited the jealousy of his superiors through displaying greater nautical skill, he was compelled to leave the vessel and enter an ordnance armed store-ship, in which he was captured by the Spaniards. He effected his escape, however, and returned to his father's farm; but, after an interval of about three years, again took to the sea, having entered a whaler as a common seaman. After making a number of voyages, he rose to the command of the vessel, and subsequently became the most successful whaling captain of his time. After making thirty voyages, he, in 1823, retired from active life with an ample competency. He was the inventor of the "round top-gallant crew's-nest," which was stated to be one of the greatest boons given to modern Arctic voyagers. In his retirement he occupied himself with various schemes of social improvement, and in 1826 published an "Essay on the Improvement of the Town and Harbour of Whitby, with its Streets and Neighbouring Highways." d. at Cropton, near Whitby, 1829; a. 1829.

SCORESBY, Rev. William, an eminent Arctic navigator, was the son of the preceding, under whom he acquired his earliest knowledge of nautical matters. He joined his father's vessel in his 10th year, and afterwards rose to the post of chief mate. In 1806 he, with his father, reached a higher latitude than had been heretofore gained, viz., to within 510 miles of the North Pole. On attaining his 21st year, his father resigned the command of the vessel to him. In 1817 Sir Joseph Banks endeavoured to obtain for him the commission of proceeding upon a voyage of exploration towards the North Pole; but the Board of Admiralty, in conformity with a rule of the service, selected an officer of the royal navy to carry out the enterprise. In 1820, after having made seventeen whaling voyages, he produced a most valuable work, entitled, "An Account of the Arctic Regions, with a History and Description of the Northern Whale Fishery." Two years later he published a second remarkable work, entitled, "Journal of a Voyage to the Northern Whale Fishery, including Researches and Discoveries on the Eastern Coast of West Greenland." He quitted the service at that time, and was shortly afterwards elected a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh. Always deeply impressed with a sense of religious duty, he next resolved to qualify himself for holy orders. He entered as student of Queen's College, Cambridge; and after being ordained, became chaplain of the mariner's church at Liverpool. He subsequently removed to a living at Exeter; but at a later period became vicar of Bradford in Yorkshire. He wrote several valuable papers upon practical magnetism and its relations to navigation, for the "Transactions" of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and likewise put forth some important pieces elucidatory of the magnetism of iron ships. Some of his other works were "Memorials of the Sea," "Discourses to Seamen," "Sabbaths in the Arctic Regions," and "Records of the Adventurous Life of the late William Scoresby." His great love for scientific research, particularly in the question of the magnetism of iron ships, induced him to make a voyage to Australia in the Royal Charter, from which he returned in 1856. b. 1790; d. at Torquay, 1857.

Scott, Sir Michael, skot, a learned Scotchman, who is assumed to be the heir of his grandfather, Sir Richard Balweary. He is believed to have studied at Paris, and to have subsequently visited the court of the emperor Frederick II. Returning to his native country, he is supposed to have been employed in various important services by Alexander III., who knighted him after the battle of Largs. His skill in chemistry and mathematics caused him to be regarded as a magician. Fragments of his works on natural history, mathematics, and philosophy remain. Dante speaks of him as a magician, in the "Inferno," and frequent allusion is made to him by Boccaccio and other Italian writers. b. in Scotland, early in the 13th century; supposed to have died 1291.

Scott, Reginald, a learned English writer, who produced "A Perfect Platform of a Hop-Garden;" "The Discovery of Witchcraft;" "Discourse upon Devils and Spirits." In the two last he combats the absurdities of witchcraft and incantations with great success. James I., in his "Demonology," attempted to refute his opinions. b. in Kent, early in the 16th century; d. 1599.

Scott, David, a Scottish historian, who was several times imprisoned on account of his attachment to the house of Stuart. He was the author of a "History of Scotland." b. in East Lothian, 1675; d. 1742.

Scott, Daniel, a learned writer, who published an essay towards a demonstration of the Scripture Trinity; in 1741 he printed a new version of St. Matthew's Gospel, with critical notes; and in 1745, an Appendix to Stephens's Greek Lexicon. d. 1739.

Scott, Sir Walter, an illustrious Scotch author. In his earliest years he was afflicted with more than the ordinary ailments of childhood. When scarcely two years of age, his right leg was found to have become suddenly powerless, and the previously healthy boy was pronounced as lame for life. In his eighth year he appeared to have gained an accession of strength, and was sent to the High School of Edinburgh; but in a few months he was once more prostrated upon a sick couch. This happened at the close of the year 1784. His naturally strong constitution triumphed over this, almost the last attack made upon it by disease, and in 1786 he was sufficiently recovered to be apprenticed to his father, a writer to the Signet. This took place when he was in his fifteenth year; but the youthful invalid had, meanwhile, been accumulating knowledge and arranging ideas, had been feeding an imagination stimulated by sickness, with stores which, though not likely ever to be utilized in his practice as a lawyer, were to prove of the most essential service to him in his career as an author. Circumstances combined to give to his awaking intellect that bent which was to conduct the Scotch lawyer's son to greatness. His grandfather at Sandy Knowe, on the Tweed, and a maiden aunt, who for a time had charge of him, were able to narrate to him those legendary tales upon which his mind longed to dwell. In his second illness, too, he was permitted to devour the contents of a circulating library, rich "in the romances of chivalry, and the ponderous folios of Cyrus and Cassandra, down to the most approved works of modern times;" and he afterwards said, "I believe I read almost all the romances, old plays, and epic poetry, in that formidable collection." As he grew older and stronger, he took long rambles on foot or on horseback through the Highland and border counties, during which he was continually making additions to his stores of legendary tales, or marking character, or observing nature. He made acquaintance with the "Reliques of Ancient Poetry," while upon a visit to an uncle who resided near Kelso. He says, "In early youth I had been an eager student of ballad poetry, and the tree is still in my recollection beneath which I lay and first entered upon the enchanting perusal of Percy's 'Reliques of Ancient Poetry,' although it has long perished in the general blight which affected the whole race of Oriental plants to which it belonged." The perusal of this, and the kindred works of Herd and Evans, led him towards philological and antiquarian research, and while attending the lectures of Dugald Stewart, in 1799, upon moral philosophy, he wrote an essay upon the "Manners and Customs of the Northern Nations of Europe," which, together with others on the origin of the Feudal system, the Scandinavian Mythology, and the authenticity of Ossian's poems, subsequently composed, he read to the Speculative Society in 1792-3. He was called to the bar in 1792; in 1799 he received the appointment of sheriff of Selkirkshire, and in 1806 became one of the principal clerks of the Court of Session. To these sources of income were added a small property inherited from an uncle, and a moderate fortune received with his wife, Miss Carpenter, whom he married in 1797. His circumstances were, accordingly, favourable for his following that career of literature to which his inclination and ambition invited him. He had long been addicted to verse-making, and had published, in 1796, a translation of Bürger's "Leonora" and the "Wild Huntsman," which marked the commencement of the poetical or first phase of his literary career. In 1799, Göthe's "Götz of Berlichingen," the ballad of "Glenfinlas," and "The Eve of St. John," followed; and when, in 1805, he gave to the public the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," he became the greatest poetical favourite of the day. "Marmion," the "Lady of the Lake," "Don Roderick," "Rokeby," the "Lord of the Isles," the "Bridal of Triermain," and "Harold the Dauntless," followed in rapid succession. The comparative failure of the two last works, which were published anonymously, seems to have decided Scott to abandon verse for prose. The second great epoch of his literary life may be said to have commenced with the anonymous publication of "Waverley," in 1814. In four years it had, for successors "Guy Mannering," the "Antiquary," the "Black Dwarf," "Old Mortality," "Rob Roy," and the "Heart of Mid-Lothian." His name was not placed upon these productions; but, although the secret of their authorship was well kept by his printer and publisher, the public began to regard Scott, the poet, as the "Great Unknown." But his active pen was not alone engaged upon the fine novels which he continued to throw off with so much facility. He was secretly in partnership with Ballantyne, his printer, and had many transactions with Constable, the Edinburgh view;" he wrote the Life of Dryden and of Swift, the biographical and critical prefaces to a collection of the English novelists, and furnished notes to Sadler's Correspondence, and works of a kindred style. In this way he was engaged between the years 1796 and 1826. His novels and poems had made him famous, and had, moreover, raised him to apparent affluence. His fine manly character caused him to be beloved by a large and distinguished circle of acquaintances. The magnificence of his disposition incited him to enact the rôle of one of those great feudal chiefs which his pen so picturesquely portrayed. Confining in his fertile genius, he became the proprietor of Abbotsford, where, in the intervals of literary composition, he dispensed the hospitalities of a prince. In brief, the interval 1820-26 may be described as one gorgeous dream. But the commercial crisis of the latter year made bankrupts of Constable & Co. and Ballantyne & Co. "A state of affairs," according to the Scotch term, was drawn up, and, in consequence of his connexion with those firms, he was found to be liable for a sum of about £147,000. Yet he was undaunted before this fearful load of debt. "Gentlemen," he said to his creditors, "time and I against any two. Let me take this good ally into my company, and I believe I shall be able to pay you every farthing." He gave up all his property, proposed to let the receipts of his literary labours in the hands of trustees for the payment of his creditors, retired into modest lodgings, and went resolutely to work to wipe off his liabilities. "It is very hard," he said, "thus to lose all the labours of a lifetime, and be made a poor man at last, when I ought to have been otherwise. But, if God grant me life and strength for a few years longer, I have no doubt that I shall redeem it all." This last unfortunate period, during which a noble mind was struggling to accomplish a Herculean task, endured from 1826 to 1832. "The History of Napoleon," "The Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft," and such works, were produced to aid the good cause he had at heart; but although he did not shrink from the responsibilities which lay upon him, his overtaxed faculties gave way beneath the excessive mental toil to which they were subjected. The great object of this, the dark and closing period of his life, was however attained. Before his death, he had materially decreased the load of debt, and, after that unhappy event, the profits of his writings wiped away the whole. It would be unnecessary to append a complete list of his works: they are too well known, and, fortunately, too easily accessible to the whole reading community, to need it. "Time alone," says an eminent authority, "can decide how much of his writings will survive, and what place they will permanently occupy in the literary world. Of this, however, there can be no doubt, that in Scott a healthy intellect was engrafted on a powerful will; that he had a natural and easy play of humour, with no inconsiderable portion of poetical imagination, and a large share of that power of apprehending and portraying character which is the great charm of Fielding. A great part of his life he indulged in a dream-world of his own; but when rudely awakened by adversity, he submitted to the consequences with heroic fortitude. He was a great and good man." His house and estate at Abbotsford became the property of J. R. Hope, Esq., the husband of his grand-daughter, Charlotte Harriet Jane Lockhart, daughter of Scott's eldest daughter Sophia and J. G. Lockhart, Esq. b. at Edinburgh, 1771; d. at Abbotsford, 1832.

THE DICTIONARY

Scott, Michael, author of "Tom Cringle's Log," and "The Cruise of the Midge," was a native of Glasgow, and received his education at the high school and university of that city. He repaired to Jamaica in 1804, where he remained till 1822, and finally settled in Scotland, where he embarked in commercial speculations. During his leisure he composed the entertaining sketches above mentioned, which first appeared in "Blackwood's Magazine;" and he preserved his incognito so well, that it was not until after his death that they were found to have proceeded from his pen. b. 1780; d. 1835.

Scott, George Gilbert, an eminent modern architect, who, at the conclusion of his apprenticeship, entered into partnership with Mr. Moffatt, a fellow-pupil. While in partnership, Mr. Scott designed, among other works, the beautiful at Glasgow known as the "Martyrs' Memorial;" and the handsome parish church at Camberwell. In 1845 he quitted Mr. Moffatt, and soon afterwards carried off, in competition with the best architects in Europe, the first prize for erecting the church of St. Nicholas at Hamburg. In 1855 he again defeated the leading architects, both English and continental, in the design for the Hôtel-de-Ville of the same city. These, and many works executed in England, placed him in the foremost rank as a Gothic architect. His principal works were, the restoration of the choir of Ely Cathedral; the new chapel, library, and other buildings at Exeter College, Oxford; and the restoration of Hereford Cathedral and St. Michael's church, Cornhill. In 1840 he became architect to the dean and chapter of Exeter minster, and was employed in designing the new abbey gate-house, and in making some restorations and improvements. He was an associate of the Royal Academy in 1855, and in 1859 was appointed architect of the new Foreign Office, in conjunction with Mr. Digby Wyatt. He likewise designed the "Westminster Memorial to Lord Raglan;" and wrote several pamphlets on Gothic architecture. b. at Gawcott, near Buckingham, 1811.

Scott, Winfield, a modern American general, was the son of a Scotch gentleman, who emigrated to America after the battle of Culloden. He was educated for the law, but quitted that profession for a military career. In 1812 he fought against the British, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Queenstown, in Canada. After obtaining his exchange, he signalled himself by taking Fort George, for which he was made general of brigade. Severely wounded at the battle of Niagara, in 1814, he, at the conclusion of the war, remained to Europe for the recovery of his health; and while at Paris, devoted himself to the study of French military tactics. Named commander-in-chief of the American army in the war with Mexico in 1847, he in a single campaign defeated Santa Anna in several engagements, took Vera Cruz and Jalapa, and marching into the city of Mexico, compelled the enemy to sign a treaty of peace. Notwithstanding his brilliant services, General Scott was twice an unsuccessful candidate for the presidency. At the outbreak of the dispute between the United States and the Secessionists, General Scott was appointed commander-in-chief of the Federalist forces, but did not take any share in the operations in the field, and indeed resigned his post after the battle of Bull Run, the movement which led to that disastrous defeat having been taken against his advice. It subsequently appeared that General Scott was opposed to the war from the first, and, in speaking of the seceding States, advised the President to let the "wayward sisters go in peace." n. in Virginia, 1786; p. 1866.

SCOTTE, Augustine Eugène, ekreeb, an eminent French dramatic author, who was the son of a merchant, and was designed for the legal profession; but, after the death of his parents, he so much neglected his studies, and at the same time evinced so strong a predilection for dramatic composition, that his guardian, the celebrated advocate Bonnet, advised him to abandon jurisprudence for the drama. Accordingly, in 1811, he, in conjunction with Germain Delavigne, an old schoolfellow, produced his first piece, entitled "The Dervish," which was unsuccessful. A similarly unfortunate reception greeted several of his after efforts; but the young playwright persevered undauntedly, and, in 1812, produced a drama which was received with the greatest applause. From that time until his death he continued to compose plays and operatic libretti with a rapidity truly astonishing. His power of constructing plots, delineating character, and composing witty and pointed dialogue, appeared to be inexhaustible. He wrote about four hundred pieces of various kinds; and both the French and the English stage (for which latter his best works have been freely adapted) owe to his fertile invention many of their greatest triumphs. The most popular of his operas are, "The Prophet," "The Crown Diamonds," "Fra Diavolo," and "Robert le Diable." The list of even his best plays is too long to be admitted into this notice. n. at Paris, 1791; p. 1861.

SCRIBONIUS LARGUS, skri-bo'-ni-us, a Roman physician in the time of Claudius, whom he accompanied to Britain. Some of his works are extant, and were printed at Bale in 1529. Flourished early in the 1st century.

SCRIVERIUS, Peter Schryver, called in Latin, sch writer, who produced "Batavia Illustrata," the "Chronicles of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht," &c. He also published editions of Vegetius, and other writers on military affairs. n. at Harlem, 1576; p. 1860.

SCUDERI, George de, skoo'-dai-re, a French poet and dramatist, who was intended and educated for the military profession, but quitted it for dramatic composition. Richelieu gave him a small fort on a rock near Marseilles for a residence; but he soon left it to return to Paris; and it was said of him, that he had shut up the fort, returned to Paris by the coach, and for fifteen years carried the keys in his pocket, n. at Havre-de-Grace, 1601; p. at Paris, 1867.

SCUDERI, Magdalen de, a French romancist, and sister of the preceding, wrote a large number of works, which were once highly popular, notwithstanding their great length. The chief of these were, "Celia," in 10 vols.; "Artemes, or the Grand Cyrus," in 10 vols.; "Ibrahim, or the Illustrious Bassa;" "Conversations and Discourses;" "A Discourse on Glory," &c. She was admitted a member of the Academy of Ricovrati at Padua, and had pensions from Cardinal Mazarin and Louis XIV. n. 1607; p. 1701.

SCYLAX, si'-lax, a geographer, mathematician, and musician of Caria, near Halicarnassus, who was employed by Darius, son of Hystaspes, in making discoveries in India. Some attribute to him the invention of geographical tables. His "Periplus of the Inhabited World" was published in the "Minor Greek Geographers" of Gail, 1826. Flourished about 510 B.C.

SEBA, Albert, seb'-a, a Dutch naturalist, who produced a beautifully-printed and illustrated work upon natural history, at Amsterdam, in 1734. The explanations are in Latin and French. n. 1685; p. 1736.

SEBASTIAN, Don, se-bas'-ti-an, king of Portugal, was the posthumous son of the Infante John, by a daughter of the Emperor Charles V., and succeeded John III. in 1557, he being then only in his third year. He engaged in an unsuccessful war with the Moors in 1574, and in 1578 went in person to assist Muley Mohammed, son of Abdalla, sultan of Morocco, against his uncle, the rightful heir to the throne; but, in a battle fought near Tangier, Sebastian was slain. Some, however, believed that the report of his death was incorrect, and that he was in captivity. This belief produced several impostors, who pretended to be Sebastian, most of whom ended their days on the scaffold or in the galleys. Sebastian having left no issue, Portugal was annexed to Spain.

SEBASTIAN DEL PIOMBO. (See PIOMBO, Sebastian del.)

SEBASTIANI, Horace François, Count, se-bas'-te-a'-ne, a French general, who was about to enter the priesthood when the Revolution caused him to join the army. After distinguishing himself in Italy under General Moreau, he obtained the command of a regiment of dragoons, at the head of which he assisted Bonaparte to carry into effect his coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire. His after-career was marked with the greatest success, both as a soldier and as a diplomatist. He signalized himself at the battle of Ansterlitz, and on being appointed to a command in Spain, in 1809, defeated the Spaniards in several encounters. He next obtained from Napoleon I. a command in the grand army prepared for the invasion of Russia; and after the battles of Smolensko and Moskwa entered the Russian capital with the advance-guard. He received a wound at the battle of Leipzig in 1813, and was subsequently posted at Cologne to defend the left bank of the Rhine; and, although forced to fall back, he distinguished himself by his skill and bravery in command of some regiments of cavalry of the Imperial Guard. He retired from active life at the abdication of the emperor, but was a member of the deputation which waited upon the allied monarchs subsequently to the disaster of Waterloo. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies during the restoration; and, upon the accession of Louis Philippe, became minister of marine, and afterwards minister of foreign affairs. He was ambassador in London in 1835, and five years later received the marshal's bâton. Soon after the murder of his daughter, the duchess de Praslin, by her husband, in 1847, his health became so seriously affected that he was compelled to retire into private life. After his demise, his body was buried in the church of the Invalides, upon which occasion the building narrowly escaped destruction by fire. Although not as brilliant in the field as the best of Napoleon's marshals, he everywhere displayed the greatest bravery and the most complete knowledge of the principles of strategy. As a diplomatist, he obtained several important advantages for his master. He is also declared to have advised Napoleon to winter in Lithuania during the invasion of Russia; which counsel, if heeded, might have averted the catastrophe which cost Napoleon his throne. n. in Corsica, 1776; d. 1851.

SECKENDORF, Veit Louis von, sek-en-dorf, a German historian, who became privy councillor to the elector of Brandenburg, and chancellor

SECKER, Thomas, sek'-er, a learned and pious English prelate, who, upon entering into orders became chaplain to Bishop Talbot, and in 1732 was instituted to the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, and appointed king's chaplain. In the year 1735, he was consecrated bishop of Bristol, and in 1737 translated to Oxford. In 1750 he obtained the deanery of St. Paul's, and in 1758 was advanced to the archbishopric of Canterbury. The sermons, charges, and lectures of this excellent prelate are distinguished by their perspicuity and eloquence. n. at Sibthorpe, Notts, 1693; d. in London, 1763.

SECOUSSE, Denis François, sek'-osse, a French writer, who was educated under Kollin, after which he became an advocate, but quitted the law for literature. He was employed by the chancellor D'Aguesseau as censor-royal, and in other public services, until he became blind. He published "A Collection of Ordinances," "Memoirs for a History of Charles the Bad," and several dissertations in the "Memoirs" of the Academy of Inscriptions. b. 1691; d. 1754.

SECKOVDS, Johannes, se-kun'-dus, a Dutch poet, who wrote in Latin, and whose family name was Everla, which he altered to the Latin one by which he is known. He studied law under Alciatus, and afterwards became secretary to the archbishop of Toledo. His poems, which are of the amatory order, and modelled after Catullus, are various and excellent. The most celebrated are the "Basia," or the Kisses, which have been translated into several languages. n. at the Hague, 1611; d. at Tournai, 1536.

SEDAINE, Michael Jean, se-dain', an eminent French dramatic writer. After the death of his father, an architect, he became so reduced in circumstances as to take up the trade of a stone-mason; but was noticed by his master, who gave him a share in the business. A taste for the drama, however, induced him to quit his trade, and to write comic operas and plays, which possess considerable merit, and some of which have been translated into English; for instance, "Richard Cœur-de-Lion" (for which Gretry wrote the music) and "Blue-Beard." He was a member of the French Academy, and secretary of that of Architecture. b. at Paris, 1719; d. at Bâle, 1797.

SENGWICK, Miss Catherine Maria, sedj'-wik, a popular American authoress, who was the author of a work of fiction, entitled "A New England Tale." Among the most successful of her productions, were "Redwood," a novel; "Hope Leslie, or Early Times in America;" "The Linwoods;" "Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home;" and a work for juvenile perusal, called "The Rich Poor Man and the Poor Rich Man." She also contributed largely to the American literary journals. b. at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1789; d. 1867.

SENGWICK, Rev. Adam, an eminent modern geologist, who was educated at the university of Cambridge, where he became fellow of Trinity College in 1808. Ten years later he was chosen to fill the chair of geology founded by Dr. Woodward. As a geologist, he principally directed his attention to the study of the crystalline rocks. His literary contributions to science were principally furnished to the "Transactions" of the Cambridge Philosophical Society and of the Geological Society, to the Reports of the British Association, the "Annals of Philosophy," and the "Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal." He was also the reputed author of the celebrated reply to the "Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation," in the "Edinburgh Review." One of the most important of his few separate works was that entitled "A Discourse on the Studies of the University of Cambridge," in which he enunciated his views relative to the bearings of physical philosophy upon the Christian religion. He was corresponding member of the French Institute and fellow of the Royal and Geological Societies. n. at Dent, Yorkshire, about 1760.

SEDLER, Sir Charles, sed'-le, an English poet, who was one of the wits of the court of Charles II. His daughter became mistress to James II., who created her Countess of Dorchester; but Sir Charles was zealous for the Revolution, and being asked the reason, answered, "From a principle of gratitude; for since his majesty has made my daughter a countess, it is fit I should do all I can to make his daughter a queen." His poems are licentious, but are written in an elegant style; he also wrote some plays, which are remarkable for little else than their loose tone of morality. b. in Kent, 1639; d. 1701.

SEDLER, Callus, se-du'-li-us, a Roman ecclesiastic and poet, who wrote a poem on the life of Christ, entitled "Carmen Paschale." It was published by Aldus in 1502. Supposed to have flourished in the 6th century.

SENGER, Paul, sein'-ya'-e, an eminent Italian preacher, whose eloquence occasioned his being appointed chaplain to Pope Innocent XII. His works are, Sermons; "The Unbeliever without Excuse;" "The Pastor instructed;" "The Illusions of the Quietists," &c. b. near Rome, 1621; d. 1694.

poet, who was educated for the priesthood, which profession he declined. Mademoiselle, daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, appointed him her gentleman in ordinary, and he was afterwards patronized by Madame de la Fayette. He was a member of the French Academy; wrote some elegant eclogues, and translated the "Georgics" and "Æneid" of Virgil into French verse. His prose works are, a collection of novels, and "Sagraisiana; or, a Miscellany of History and Literature." n. at Caen, 1624; p. 1701.

SEGUIER, Pierre, seg'-e-ai, an eminent French lawyer, who, in 1584, was nominated president à mortier, the highest functionary but one in the Parisian Parliament. In that office he boldly and successfully argued against the introduction of the Inquisition into France. He left six sons, all of whom fulfilled high legal functions. n. at Paris, 1504; p. 1580.

SEGUIER, Jean François, an eminent French botanist, who was educated for the legal profession, but renounced it to follow the pursuit of science. He accompanied the Marquis Scipio Maffei on his travels in France, England, Holland, and Germany; and, on his return to his own country, became principal of the academy of Nîmes. His principal works are, "Bibliotheca Botanica," "Plantæ Veronenses," and a translation of the works of Maffei. n. at Nîmes, 1708; p. 1764.

SEGUIER, Antoine Louis, an eminent French lawyer, who became advocate-general of the Parisian Parliament. Upon the dissolution of that body in 1790, he was offered the post of mayor of Paris, which he declined, choosing rather to live in retirement during the revolutionary storm; but a pamphlet appearing under the title of "Seguier treated as he deserves," he deemed it prudent to quit his native country. n. at Paris, 1728; p. 1792.

SEGUIER, Philip Henry, Marquis de, sas'-goor, a French marshal, who served with distinction in Italy and Bohemia, and particularly at the battle of Prague. He was created a marshal by Louis XVI. in 1783, having previously been nominated minister of war. During the Revolution he was imprisoned in La Force, but was subsequently liberated by Napoleon when first consul, and also granted a pension of 4000 francs. n. 1724; p. at Paris, 1801.

SEGUIER, Louis Philip, Count de, a French diplomatist and historical writer, who fought against the English in America, in the service of the Americans, until the termination of the struggle; after which he returned to France. He was subsequently appointed ambassador to Russia, and became a favourite with Catharine II., whom he accompanied in her tour to the Crimea in 1787. During the Revolution he narrowly escaped persecution. He afterwards devoted himself to literature, and produced a great number of works. n. 1753; p. 1830.

SEGUIER, Philip Paul, son of the preceding, served in the French army with distinction on many occasions, and in 1812 became maréchal-de-camp, and took part in numerous sanguinary actions in 1813-1814. He was created a peer for life in 1831; and wrote the "History of Napoleon and the Grand Army in 1812," giving an account of the Russian campaign, which passed through several editions, caused a good deal of controversy, and involved the author in a duel with Gourgaud. n. 1780.

SELIANUS, Lucius Ælius, sej'

rated Roman, was the son of Seius Strabo, a Roman knight. He first ingratiated himself into favour with Caius Cesar, the grandson of Augustus, but afterwards attached himself to Tiberius, who made him his confidant. He also contrived, by his pliability of temper and insinuating address, to gain the affections of the people, the soldiers, and the senate. He was appointed commander of the prætorian guards, and had the disposal of all places of trust and honour, which he gave to his own creatures. Inflamed by ambition, he aspired to the imperial throne, and, to gain his end, murdered Drusus, the son of the emperor; after which he declared his intention of marrying Julia, the widow of Drusus; but this was opposed by Tiberius. The emperor at length perceiving the real views of his favourite, caused him to be accused before the senate; on which he was deserted by his friends and sent to prison, where he was strangled, a.d. 31. His body, after being dragged about the streets, was thrown into the Tiber.

SELDEN, John, self-den, a learned English lawyer and writer, who, after receiving his education at the university of Oxford, in 1604 took up his residence in the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar, and became distinguished as a profound lawyer and antiquary. At the age of 22 he drew up a treatise on the Civil Government of England before the Conquest, which gained him great reputation. In 1614 he published his "Titles of Honour," and in 1618 his "History of Tithes," which gave great alarm to the clergy, and was answered by several writers. Being prosecuted in the High Commission court, he made an apology for having questioned the divine right of the clergy to receive tithes. In 1621 he was committed to custody as the principal promoter of the protest made by the Commons respecting their privileges. In 1623 he was chosen member of Parliament for Lancaster, and in 1625 was returned for Great Bedwin, in Wiltshire. He afterwards again represented Lancaster, and was appointed one of the managers of the prosecution of the duke of Buckingham, and had also a principal share in drawing up the Petition of Rights. For his opposition to the court he was, in 1629, sent to the Tower, whence he was removed to the King's Bench, and in 1634 admitted to bail. From this period he took a less active part against the king. In 1636 he published his "Defence of the King's Dominion over the British Seas," in answer to Grotius. In 1642 he was offered the great seal, which he refused. Though he signed the Covenant, and was appointed keeper of the records, as also a member of the Assembly of Divines, he refused to write a reply to the "Eikon Basilike," which he had been requested to do by Cromwell. n. in Sussex, 1584; p. in London, 1654.

SELEUCUS I., se-lu'-kus, surnamed Nicator, or Victorious, after the death of Alexander the Great, received Babylon as his province. When he had strengthened himself in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the rest of the generals of Alexander, and assumed the title of independent monarch. He subsequently obtained Syria and Cappadocia and founded many cities which he peopled with Greek colonies, whose national industry, learning, &c., were communicated to the indolent inhabitants of Asia. Seleucus was murdered 280 b.c. in the 82nd year of his age. He was succeeded by Antiochus Soter.

SELEUCUS II., surnamed Callinicus, succeeded his father, Antiochus Theus, on the throne of Syria, B.C. 246. After he had been a prisoner for some time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horse, B.C. 226.

SELEUCUS III. succeeded his father Seleucus II. on the throne of Syria, and received the surname of Ceraunus. He was a very weak, timid monarch, and was murdered by his officers after a reign of three years, B.C. 223. His brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, ascended the throne, and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great.

SELEUCUS IV. succeeded his father Antiochus the Great, B.C. 187. He was surnamed Philopator, or, according to Josephus, Soter. He was poisoned after a reign of twelve years, B.C. 175.

SELEUCUS V., son of Demetrius Nicator, succeeded Antiochus Sidetes on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age, B.C. 124. He was put to death in the first year of his reign, by Cleopatra, his mother.

SELEUCUS VI., the last of the name, was the son of Antiochus Grypus. He was driven from his kingdom by Antiochus Eusebes, and fled to Cilicia, where he was besieged in Mopsuestia and killed, B.C. 95.

SELM I., sel-ilm, emperor of the Turks, was the second son of Bajazet II., whom he dethroned and put to death, as he did his two brothers subsequently. Having secured the throne by these crimes, he turned his arms with success against Egypt and Persia. The former country he completely conquered, and put an end to the dominion of the Mamelukes, which had lasted above 260 years. B. 1467; D. 1520.

SELM II., grandson of the above, succeeded his father Solymán II. in 1568. In 1570 he broke the treaty which his father had made with the Venetians, and took the island of Cyprus; but the year following he lost the battle of Lepanto, where his navy was almost wholly destroyed. This disaster obliged him to sue for peace. D. 1574.

SELM III., younger son of Mustapha and brother of Abdul-Hamid, whom he succeeded in 1780, was one of the most enlightened men of his country, and formed the idea of regenerating the Turkish empire. The commencement of his reign was, however, very much troubled. His army was defeated by the allied Austrians and Russians, the latter taking Bender and Ismail. In 1792 he lost the Crimea, which was incorporated with Russia. The French subsequently invaded Egypt, and his army was annihilated by Bonaparte: the province was, however, retaken by the English, who restored it to the Porte. Having purchased a peace at the price of ceding territory to Russia, he commenced his cherished plans of reform. He remodelled his army after the European plan, introduced new modes of raising the taxes, and sought to introduce European civilization into his empire; but a fresh war breaking out, in which he was defeated by the Russians and English, his army became dissatisfied. The Janissaries also rose in insurrection and deposed Selim, placing his nephew, Mustapha IV., upon the throne. He was at first placed in confinement, but was, in strangled by order of Mustapha. B. 1761.

SELLS, Nicolas Joseph, sai'-le, a French poet, who became professor of the belles-lettres in the central school of the Pantheon, and a member of the National Institute. His most important works are, a translation of Persius, with notes; "Relation of the Disorder, Confession, and Death of M. de Voltaire;" and "Epistles in Verse." B. at Paris, 1737; D. 1802.

SELKIRK, Alexander, sel'-kirk, a Scotch adventurer, who was a skilful seaman, and made several voyages to the South Sea; in one of which, having quarrelled with his commander, he was put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, with a few necessaries, a fowling-piece, gunpowder, and shot. Here he lived alone during four years and four months, and was then rescued by Captain Woods Rogers. During the time of his remaining on the island he had nearly forgotten his native language. He returned to England in 1711, and is said to have given his papers to Defoe, who took from them his story of "Robinson Crusoe;" but there is little doubt that the latter was indebted to Selkirk for nothing more than the main idea of the work. B. at Largo, Fife, 1670.

SEMLER, John Solomon, sem'-ler, an eminent German Protestant theologian, who was educated in the doctrines of the Pietists, but afterwards abandoned those views, and became one of the most eloquent supporters of Rationalism. The Rationalists denied the divine origin of the Scriptures, but admitted the doctrines to be true and according to reason. In 1751 he was nominated professor of theology at Halle; but was removed from that and other posts by the minister Zedlitz, in 1779. His writings consist of dissertations upon the doctrines of Rationalism, and argumentative essays against the Deists. He likewise produced a sort of autobiography of himself, and several works upon philology, ecclesiastical history, &c. B. at Sealfeld, 1725; D. 1794.

SEMPRONIUS, sem-pro'-ni-us, a name common to many eminent Romans, the most celebrated of whom were:—Sempronius Atratinus, a senator who opposed the agrarian law, which was proposed by the consul Cassius, soon after the election of the tribunes.—Publius Tuditanus, a legionary tribune, who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the soldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards consul, and fought against Hannibal with great success. He was killed in Spain.—Tiberius Græchus, a consul, who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was subsequently betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody resistance against the enemy. Hannibal showed great honour to his remains, a funeral pile was raised at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in solemn procession.

SENAC, Jean, sen'-ak, a French physician, who cured Marshal Saxe of a dangerous malady, and became first physician to Louis XV., and superintendent-general of the mineral waters of the kingdom. His principal works were,—translation of Helster's "Anatomy;" with "Physical Essays on the Use of the Parts of the Human Body;" "Treatise on the Plague;" "On the Structure of the Heart;" "Drowned Persons," &c. B. 1693; D. 1770.

Seneca

preacher. He wrote, among other works, a "Treatise on the Passions," which has been translated into English; a "Paraphrase on Job;" "The Christian Man and the Criminal Man;" and "The Duties of a Sovereign." B. at Antwerp, 1599; D. at Paris, 1672.

SENECA, Marcus Annaeus, sen'-e-ka, a celebrated orator, who settled at Rome, where he was greatly distinguished as a pleader. His declamations are printed with the works of his son. B. at Cordova, Spain, about 53 B.C.; D. about A.D. 32.

SENECA, Lucius Annaeus, a celebrated philosopher, who was son of the preceding, and received a liberal education at Rome, where he applied himself to elocution, and displayed great abilities as an advocate; but, being afraid of exciting the jealousy of Caligula, who aspired to the glory of eloquence, he relinquished that profession, obtained the office of quaestor, and rose to distinction, but was subsequently banished to Corsica, in consequence, it is supposed, of having had an intrigue with Julia, daughter of Germanicus. While in exile he wrote his "Epistles" and "Treatise on Consolation." After some years he was recalled by Agrippina, wife of the emperor Claudius, and appointed tutor to her son Nero. This office Seneca discharged with great honour, and was bountifully rewarded; but when his pupil came to the throne, Seneca, who was aware of his avaricious disposition, solicited him to accept the villas and vast riches which he had amassed, that he might retire to a life of study and solitude. This the emperor refused, but soon found an opportunity of destroying his preceptor. When the conspiracy of Piso was discovered, Seneca was declared to be implicated, and orders were sent to him to put an end to himself. The philosopher, without expressing any concern, took poison, which had no effect; he then had his veins opened; but the blood flowed so slowly, that he was removed into a hot bath, and thence to a stove, where he was suffocated. His wife, Paulina, resolving to die with him, also had her veins opened; but Nero, fearful that this would excite general indignation against himself, commanded that the flow of blood should be stopped and her life preserved. Seneca's works consist of epistles, various moral treatises, and ten tragedies (his authorship of which has been doubted, but, according to the best authorities, without reason). The editions of these works are numerous; one of the best and most recent is that of C. F. Fickert, Leipzig, 1845. Several of the tragedies have been translated into English. B. at Cordova, Spain, about 3 B.C.; D. 65 A.D.

SENEFELDER, or SENEFELDER, Alois, sen'-e-fel-der, the inventor of the art of lithography, was the son of an actor in the theatre at Munich. He was designed for the legal profession, but had a strong predilection for the stage, as well as for dramatic composition. At the death of his father he was left without pecuniary means, and, after making some unsuccessful attempts as an actor, resolved to devote himself to writing for the stage. Being too poor to pay for the printing of his works, he determined to make himself acquainted with some cheap substitute for typography. He tried etching on copper plates, which finding too expensive, he had recourse to slabs of fine Kellheim stone. He also invented an ink for writing upon these slabs. But the great step in the discovery was made through accident. He had occasion to make a memorandum, but found himself without either paper or ink: he had, however, before him one of his prepared stone slabs, and, with the intention of afterwards cleaning the stone, he wrote upon it with his printing-ink. It subsequently occurred to him that he might etch his writing upon the stone in sufficient relief to print from. He succeeded, and, after a long course of experimentation, conducted under the greatest difficulties, he brought his invention into a practical form. He afterwards visited London and Paris, for the purpose of deriving advantage from his process, but met with little success. In 1809, however, he was rewarded for his early trials, in being appointed inspector of the royal lithographic establishment of Bavaria. Thus, placed in easy circumstances, he was enabled to make improvements in his process, which caused it to become valuable, and universally appreciated. In 1819 he received the gold medal of the London Society for the Encouragement of the Arts, and, about the same time, published an account of his invention, in a work entitled "A Complete Course of Lithography," &c. B. at Munich, about 1771; D. at the same city, 1834.

SENIOR, Nassau William, se'-ni-er, an English political economist, who was nominated professor of that science at the university of Oxford, in 1826. He wrote extensively upon the same subject, and was a contributor to the "Encyclopedia Metropolitana," and other works. Educated for the legal profession, he obtained a mastership in chancery, which office he retained till 1853. In 1859 he published a valuable work, called "Journal kept in Turkey and Greece in 1857-58." B. at Uffington, Berkshire, 1790; D. 1884.

SENNERTS, Daniel, sen'-ner'-tus, a learned German physician, who became professor of physic at Wirtemberg. He sought to reconcile the theories of Paracelsus with those of Galen. His works were printed at Venice in 1640, in 3 vols. folio, and at Lyons in 1676, in 6 vols. B. 1572; D. 1637.

SEPPINGS, Sir Robert, sep'-pings, an eminent English naval architect, who, during fifty years, fulfilled the duties of assistant master-shipwright at Plymouth, and master-shipwright at Chatham dockyards, and, finally became surveyor of the navy. To him are due the invention of the system of "diagonal bracing" in ship-building, and the substitution of round for flat sterns to vessels of war. His improvements met with much opposition when they were first broached; but, Sir John Barrow and other eminent men giving him their powerful advocacy, he was enabled to triumph over the prejudices of the older shipwrights, as well as those of naval commanders who were opposed to any innovations. His great merits as a naval architect were acknowledged by his being created a knight and elected a fellow of the Royal Society, whose Copley medal was voted him. He was awarded the sum of £1000 by the Admiralty, and both Houses of Parliament gave a marked approbation to his labours. Accounts of his inventions were inserted in the "Transactions" of the Royal Society, and in the works of Dr. Young. B. 1769; D. in Somersetshire, 1840.

SEPULVEDA, John de, sei-pool-vai'-da, a Spanish historian. He became chaplain and historiographer to Charles V., who also appointed him tutor to his son, afterwards Philip II. He wrote, among other learned works, the histories of the reign of Charles V. and Philip II., and of the Spanish conquests in Mexico. n. near Cordova, 1490; p. 1673.

SERAPION ser-rai'-pi-on, a Syrian physician, who produced a collection of all that had been written upon the treatment of diseases by the Greek and Arabic physicians. A full account of his opinions is to be found in Sprengel's "History of Medicine." Flourished in the 9th century.

SERAPION, an Arabian physician, commonly called Serapion Junior. He wrote a treatise upon medicine, which has been declared to be one of the most important works in Arabic medical literature. There is a manuscript copy of it in Arabic in the Bodleian library at Oxford. Lived in the 11th century.

SERAPUS, ser'-ji-us, patriarch of Constantinople in 610, was a native of Syria, and the chief of the sect of Monothelites, the principle of which was that there are only one will and one operation in Christ. This heresy was condemned in the Council of Constantinople, p. 639.

SERAPUS I., Pope, and the successor of Canon, in 687. He baptized Cedwalla, king of the West Saxons, who had made a journey to Rome for that purpose. He opposed the canons of the Council of Constantinople; whereupon Justinian II. sent his general-in-chief to arrest Sergius; but the exarch of Ravenna protected the pope, who humanely interposed to save the life of Justinian's envoy. He instituted several ceremonies, and established various churches at Rome. p. in Syria, about 630; n. at Rome, 701.

SERGIVS II. succeeded Gregory IV. in 814. He was elected without the authorization of the emperor Lotharius, who dispatched an army into Italy, under the command of his son Louis. But the pope succeeded in inducing that prince to retire, after having crowned him king of Italy. Shortly afterwards, the Saracens from Africa ascended the Tiber, and ravaged the environs of Rome, but were prevented from gaining an entrance into the city itself, in consequence of the defence offered by the walls which surrounded it. Sergius was a native of Rome, and n. 847.

SERGIVS III. became pope in 904, through the influence of the marquis of Tuscan and of a notorious Roman lady named Marozia. These personages were at the head of a powerful party which had deposed Christopher. A son of Sergius, by Marozia, afterwards became pope by the title of John X. The character of Sergius has been variously represented; but he appears to have been an able but profligate man. His successor was Anastasius III. p. 911.

SERGIVS IV. was elected in succession to John XVIII. in 1009. Under his rule, and in consequence of his exhortation, the Italian princes combined to drive out the Saracens from the country. In his time, also, the Normans began to enter Italy. His successor was Benedict VIII. p. 1012.

SERRANO, Francisco, Duke de la Torre, ser-ra'-no, an eminent Spanish marshal and statesman, who for a long course of years was a powerful supporter of the throne and dynasty of Isabella II. His opinions began to change about 1850, and in 1854 he was exiled for his share in the outbreak at Saragossa in that year. The revolution which immediately followed caused him to return to Spain, and he again took an active part in politics and was sent to France as ambassador in 1857. His liberal opinions becoming strengthened by the abuses which prevailed at the court of Isabella II, he became an object of suspicion in 1868, and, with several other generals, was exiled to the Canary Islands. Returning almost immediately he joined Prim, Topete, and others in causing the army and navy to rise against the Queen and declare her dynasty at an end. Having defeated the royalists in the battle of Alcolea, he became the chief of the provisional government, and after the settlement of the new constitution, in 1869, was made Regent of the kingdom until the nation had made choice of a king. He was created a duke and grandee of Spain for his services at St. Domingo by the suppression of the insurrection of 1862. n. about the close of the eighteenth century.

SERTORIUS, Quintus, ser'-tor-i-us, a Roman general, who made his first campaign under Marius, against the Cimbr and Teutones. He afterwards accompanied Marius and Cinnas, when they entered Rome and slew their enemies. On being proscribed by Sylla, he fled to Spain, where he put himself at the head of the other exiles, and was regarded as a prince in that country, which he governed with great wisdom and moderation. He repulsed several armies that were sent against him, defeating both Pompey and Metellus. He entered into a treaty with Mithridates, who sent him money and ships, and sought to establish a new Roman republic in Spain. His soldiers followed him with the most blind devotion, believing him to be favoured by the gods. Ptoarch wrote his life. Assassinated by Perpenna, one of his generals, n.c. 72.

SERVANDONI, John Jerome, ser'-ran-done, an Italian architect and painter, who resided during the greatest part of his life at Paris, where he had the management of the scenery belonging to the theatre. In 1749 he went to London, to design the edifice on Tower Hill erected for the display of fireworks to celebrate the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. His "Descent of Eneas into Hell" was his best performance as a painter; the portal of St. Sulpice, at Paris, being his masterpiece in architecture. n. at Florence, 1695; n. at Paris, 1766.

SERVETUS, Michael, ser'-et-us, a celebrated theologian and physician, who was educated for the profession of an advocate, at Toulouse, but afterwards studied physic at Paris, where he took his doctor's degree. Having embraced the Arian doctrine, he held a correspondence with Calvin on the subject, and many letters passed between them, which only irritated them against each other. Servetus, who was settled at Vienne, in Dauphny, published a book in favour of his notions, entitled "Christianismi Restitutio;" but he avoided putting his name to it. The authorship was, however, discovered by Calvin, who gave information of it to the magistrates of Vienna, by whom Servetus was banished, and his effigy and book burnt at the gallows. He then formed the design of going to Naples to practise as a physician; but imprudently passing through Geneva in disguise, he was detected by Calvin, by whose means he was apprehended. Through Calvin, also, who acted as informer, prosecutor, and judge, Servetus was, contrary to law, condemned to be slowly burnt to death, which act of barbarity was carried into effect. He wrote several books on the Trinity, a translation of Ptolemy's Geography, and some medical treatises. Having shown that he was acquainted with the many circulation, some writers have endeavoured to ascribe to him the discovery of the circulation of the blood; to which, however, he had no claim. n. at Villanueva, Aragon, 1509; burnt at the stake, at Geneva, 1553.

SERVIVS TULLIVS, the sixth king of Rome, who, according to the legend (which is, however, allowed to have some historical foundation), was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to his wife Tanaquil, who brought up the youth with her family, and added the name of "Servius" to that which he had inherited from his father, to denote his being born of a slave. He was educated in the palace with great care, and obtained the daughter of Tarquin in marriage. His own private virtues recommended him to the notice of the people and of the soldiers; and by his liberality and complaisance he easily gained the throne on the death of his father-in-law. He endeared himself to his subjects as a warrior and as a legislator; defeated the Veientes and Tuscans; established the census, which showed that Rome contained about 84,000 inhabitants; beautified the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the eldest to Tarquin, and the younger to Aruns. In this union he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Aruns murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. Servius was next murdered by his son-in-law and his daughter Tullia, who cruelly ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, n.c. 534.

SERVIVS, DOMENICO, sis-te-ne, an eminent Italian numismatist, who was at first librarian to the Prince of Biscari, in Sicily, and afterwards became tutor to the sons of the Neapolitan ambassador at Constantinople. In 1810 he was appointed antiquary at Florence to the grand-duchess Eliza, sister of Napoleon I., and subsequently fulfilled the same functions under Leopold II., the grand-duke of Tuscany. His works are very valuable and numerous; the most important of them being, "System of Numismatics," letters upon the same science, and dissertations upon the Coins of the Ptolemies, the Macedonian kings, &c. n. at Florence, about 1750; n. at Florence, 1832.

SERVIVS, ELKANAH, ser-vel, an English poet, who wrote the tragedies of "Cambyse, King of Persia," "The Empress of Morocco," and "Fatal Love;" also poems, particularly "The Medal Reversed," and "Azariah and Hushai," both against Dryden; but although he was for a time patronized by Rochester and the court party, he soon sank into insignificance before his great rival. n. at Dunstable, Bedfordshire 1648; n. in London, 1724.

by dispossessing his father of Poonah: after which he continued to make acquisitions of territory, until, in 1658, the Bejapoor monarchy, whose vassal he was, sent a powerful force against him. He assassinated, by treachery, the general of the Bejapoor army, which he afterwards defeated and dispersed. He next surprised and plundered Surat: but, deeming it prudent to avoid hostilities with the powerful Aurungzebe, he made his submission to that potentate, and for some time acted as his ally. In 1670 he found himself sufficiently secure in his possessions to enter into hostilities with the Moguls. He again plundered Surat, and in 1672 totally defeated a Mogul force which had been sent against him. Two years later he was crowned at Rayghur, and soon afterwards he took some strong positions between Madras and Pondicherry, and then overran Mysore. In 1678 he again met the troops of Aurungzebe, his time in Golconda. He drove the Moguls before him; after which he became the greatest potentate in Southern India, having all the country between the Toombuddra and the Kistna ceded to him. But his ambitious career was soon brought to a termination by a sudden illness, which caused his death. Elphinstone declares "that Servajee left a character which has never been equalled or approached by any of his countrymen." He was succeeded by his son Sambajee, who was, however, not equal to his father, and was defeated and slain in 1689.

SEVERINO, MARCUS AURELIUS, sei-vai-re-no, a celebrated Neapolitan physician. Through his mode of practice, no less than by his writings, the science of medicine was advanced in Italy. He became professor of anatomy and medicine at the university of Naples. He wrote against the doctrines of Aristotle, and left some works on medicine. n. in Calabria, 1580; n. 1656.

SEVERUS, LUCIUS CORNELIVS, se-ve-rus, a Latin poet in the reign of Augustus, who wrote poems upon the death of Cicero, the Sicilian war, &c. Flourished about 80 n.c.

SEVERUS, CASSIVS, a Roman orator, who was banished into Crete by Augustus for his satirical language. He was distinguished for his eloquence; but it was of a more fervid than prudent character. His declamations were ordered to be destroyed by the senate. Flourished about 10 n.c.

SEVERUS, a heretic, who maintained that there are two opposite principles, the one good and the other evil, by which man was originally created, and by which he continues to be governed. Flourished in the 2nd century.

SEVERUS, LUCIVS SEPTIMIIVS, a Roman emperor, who passed through various offices of the state, and was distinguished for his ambition, activity, and avarice. After the murder of Pertinax, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by the army in Germany, and at once advanced upon Rome to secure his title. His reception at Rome was gratifying to his vanity; but he was opposed by Pescennius Niger, who had a numerous army in the East. Many battles were fought between them; but at length Niger was destroyed, and his head sent to Severus, who behaved with the utmost cruelty to all the partisans of his unfortunate rival. Elated with this success, he pillaged Byzantium, and attempted to put away, by assassination, Albinus, whom he had previously accepted as his colleague in the empire; but being foiled, he had recourse to arms. Albinus was defeated and slain in Gaul, his family and adherents sharing his fate. Severus, on his return to Rome, put to death the wealthiest citizens, that he might possess himself of their property. Tired of an inactive life, he marched into the East, where he made numerous conquests. In 208 he set out upon his British campaign, accompanied by his two sons, Caracalla and Geta; and having reduced a portion of the island, built a wall across the northern part, to defend the Roman possessions from the invasions of the Caledonians. Severus, worn out with a complication of disorders, died at York, 211. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and, were it not for his inexorable cruelty, might be placed among the most distinguished of the Roman emperors. n. in Africa, 146.

SEVERUS, Marcus Aurelius Alexander, a Roman emperor, was the cousin of the emperor Elagabalus, at whose death he was proclaimed emperor, 222. Towards the close of his reign, the peace of the empire was disturbed by the incursions of the Persians. Alexander marched into the East; but is said to have suffered defeat. The revolt of the Germans subsequently called him from the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with some success; but his soldiers were undisciplined and turbulent; their clamours were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midst of his camp, after a reign of thirteen years. His mother, Julia Mamaea, shared his fate, with all his friends. Severus possessed many virtues, was a patron of literature, and dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets. n. in Phœnicia, 208; killed, 235.

SEVERUS, Sulpicius, an ecclesiastical historian, and surnamed the Christian Sallust. The best of his works is his "Historia Sacra," which extends from the Creation to A.D. 400. n. 420.

SEVERUS, Alexandrinus, a Greek rhetorician, who wrote, among other works, some "Ethopœia," or imitations of speeches adapted to the character and to the supposed persons. They contain, among others, the supposed speeches of Æschines upon going into banishment, and that of Menelaus upon the abduction of Helen by Paris. Flourished about 470.

SÉVIGNÉ, Marie de Rabutin de Chantal, Marchioness de, se-veen'-yai, a celebrated letter-writer, was the daughter of the Baron de Chantal, who lost his life in defending the Isle of Rhé against the English. After receiving a most careful education under her maternal uncle, she espoused, at the age of 18, the Marquis de Sévigné, who fell in a duel in 1651, leaving her with one son and a daughter, to whose education she paid strict attention. The daughter married, in 1669, the Count de Grignan, commandant in Provence; and while on a visit to her, the marchioness caught a fever, of which she died. Her letters are examples of the style, being elegant, picturesque, and n. in Burgundy, 1627; n. in Provence, 1696.—Her son Charles, Marquis de Sévigné, was one of the admirers of Ninon de l'Enclos, and had a dispute with Madame Dacier respecting the sense of a passage in Horace. n. 1713.

SEVIR, François, se-vîr, a learned French Philologist, who became a member of the Academy of the Belles Lettres, and keeper of the manuscripts in the library of the king of France. By order of Louis XV., he proceeded to Constantinople with the Abbé Fourmont, in search of manuscripts, of which they procured about 600. He afterwards wrote an account of his travels, in letters. He also wrote a dissertation on the first king of Egypt, the histories of Assyria and Lydia, and several other curious discourses. n. 1682; p. 1741.

SEWARD, William, su'-ard, an English compiler, who published five volumes of anecdotes of distinguished persons, extracted from curious old books, to which he afterwards added a supplement, under the title of "Biographiana." n. in London, 1747; p. 1799.

SEWARD, Anna, an English authoress, was the daughter of a divine of the established church, who had himself written poems, besides editing Beaumont and Fletcher. Miss Seward was enabled, early in life, to profit by the society of several distinguished men who visited her father's residence, and among whom was Dr. Johnson. In 1782 she commenced her literary career, with the publication of a poetical novel, entitled "Louisa," which was so favourably received as to run through four editions. A collection of sonnets, and the "Life of Dr. Darwin," were her next publications; but although they met with some success, they were too slight in substance and too n. in style to attain a permanent reputation. She bequeathed her unpublished works and letters to Sir Walter Scott, and to the publisher, Mr. Constable. These performances were produced after her death; but although they had the advantage of a biographical preface, written by the great novelist, they soon sank into oblivion. n. 1747; p. 1900.

SEWARD, William Henry, a modern American statesman, who was educated for the law, which profession he practised during several years. After visiting Europe, he was in 1838 elected governor of the state of New York, which position he retained until 1842. In 1849 he was returned to Congress, where he made himself remarkable for his speeches against slavery. In 1853 he published an edition of his speeches, state papers, and miscellaneous works. Upon the election of Mr. Lincoln to the presidency, he became secretary of state; his public conduct of affairs, however, subsequently evoked considerable animadversion. When Abraham Lincoln was assassinated in 1865, an attempt was made on Seward's life, and he was severely wounded. n. 1801.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Seymour

The best edition of this author is that of Fabricius, Leipsic, 1718. Flourished about 200 A.D.

SEYMOUR, Lady Jane, se-moor, the third wife of Henry VIII., and the mother of Edward VI., was at first maid of honour to Anne Boleyn, whom she supplanted in 1536. She died in 1537, a few days after giving birth to her son.

SEYMOUR, Edward, brother of Lady Jane Seymour, and uncle of Edward VI., was created Viscount Beauchamp and duke of Somerset. On the accession of his nephew to the throne, Seymour became his guardian, and Protector of the kingdom. He was accused of abusing his high trust by the earl of Warwick and other courtiers, and was beheaded in 1553.

SEYMOUR, Thomas, admiral of England, brother of the preceding, by whom he was brought to the scaffold, on a pretended charge of treason, in 1549.

SEYMOUR, Anne, Margaret, and Jane, daughters of the Duke of Somerset, were distinguished for their poetical talents. They composed Latin verses on the death of Margaret de Valois, queen of France, which were translated into French, Greek, and Italian, and printed at Paris in 1551. Anne, the eldest of these ladies, married first the earl of Warwick, and afterwards Sir Edward Hutton. Jane was maid of honour to Queen Elizabeth.

SEYMOUR, Sir George Hamilton, a modern English diplomatist, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, commenced public life in 1817. From 1819 to 1821 he was employed in the Foreign-office; but, in the following year, accompanied the Duke of Wellington to the congress of Verona. He afterwards served as a subordinate to the British representatives at Frankfurt, Berlin, Constantinople, Florence, and Brussels. He was British minister at Lisbon in 1846, and was in 1851 removed to St. Petersburg. In that capacity he held with the emperor Nicholas those famous secret interviews, during which the czar declared the condition of Turkey to be that of "a sick man," whose inheritance he offered to divide between Russia and England. A few weeks before the declaration of war between Russia and Great Britain, he found it necessary to quit St. Petersburg; and towards the close of the year 1855 Sir Hamilton was appointed the successor to the earl of Westmoreland at Vienna. His diplomatic services were rewarded by his being created G.C.B. and G.C.H. In 1858 he retired from public service. B. 1797.

SEYMOUR, Sir Michael, a modern English admiral, who entered the navy in 1813, on board the Hannibal, commanded by his father. He became a post-captain in 1826, and after seeing some service in the Mediterranean and on the South American station, was appointed inspector-general of docks at Devonport. During the Russian war he acted as flag-captain to Sir Charles Napier in the Baltic. In 1855 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and was soon afterwards appointed second in command to Sir David Dundas, who had succeeded Sir Charles Napier in the command of the Baltic fleet. In the following year he went out to the Chinese station as commander-in-chief. In that capacity he demanded of the authorities at Canton reparation for the insults offered to the English flag; but not obtaining a fitting response, opened fire upon the forts which ended the city. These forts were taken,

Sir Michael subsequently represented Devonport in Parliament, but resigned his seat in 1863 on being appointed to an active command. B. near Plymouth, 1802.

SEYMOUR, Lady Arabella. (See STUART, Lady Arabella.)

SEYSSER, Claude de, sai-sel, an eminent French historian and classicist, who became professor of eloquence at Turin, afterwards councillor to Louis XII. of France, and at a later period, and in succession, bishop of Marseilles and archbishop of Turin. His most important works were,—"The Singular History of Louis XII." "The Great Monarchy of France," a treatise upon the Salic law, and translations into French of Thucydides, Xenophon, Seneca, &c. He was among the first Frenchmen who wrote their native language with elegance and precision; and was likewise a fine and vigorous writer of the Latin, in which language he composed a number of works. B. about 1450; d. 1520.

SFONDRATI, Francesco, sfont-dra'-te, an Italian cardinal, who was at first a senator of Milan, and councillor of state to the emperor Charles V. On the death of his wife he entered into orders and was elevated to the cardinalship. He was appointed governor of Siena, and earned, by his wise and humane administration, the epithet of the "father of his country," which was applied to him by the inhabitants. He wrote several works upon politics and jurisprudence, and a Latin poem on the Rape of Helen. B. at Cremona, 1493; d. 1550.—His son Nicolas became pope, by the name of Gregory XIV.—There was another cardinal of this name and family, who wrote several works against the liberties of the Gallican church. D. 1698.

SFORZA, Jacopo Attendolo, surnamed, sfont'-dra'-a, a celebrated Italian general, who, according to some accounts, was the son of a labourer, and, to others, of a shoemaker. Early in life he joined a company of adventurers, who gave their services upon hire to the petty rulers and republics of that period, and, after passing through the inferior military ranks, became a general. He was for a long time in the service of Joan, queen of Naples, who made him constable of the kingdom. Pope Martin V. appointed him gonfalonier of the holy church, and created him Count de Cotignola, to which was added a large pension. He obliged Alphonso, king of Aragon, to raise the siege of Naples, and retook several important places which had revolted; but being too eager in pursuing the flying enemy, was drowned in the river Pescara, 1424.

SFORZA, Francesco, natural son of the preceding, was brought up to the profession of arms under his father, and was with him at the time of his death. He was created a Count, received some estates in Naples from Queen Joan, afterwards commanded with success against the king of Aragon; and on the death of Joan, attached himself to the duke of Anjou, whom she had made her heir. The pope, the Venetians, and Florentines, elected him their general against the duke of Milan, who purchased Sforza's alliance by giving him his daughter in marriage. On the duke's death, in 1447, the Milanese chose him for their general against the Venetians; but, after some actions, he turned his arms against themselves, besieged Milan, and compelled the inhabitants to elect him their duke. He also

SFORZA, Catherine, a heroine of the same family, was the natural daughter of Galeazzo Sforza, duke of Milan, who was assassinated in 1476. In 1500 her late husband's lordship of Forlì was besieged by the duke of Valentinois, son of Pope Alexander VI.; but she defended the fortress with the greatest bravery, though the besiegers threatened to put to death her children, who were in their hands. At length the place was taken, and Catherine sent prisoner to Rome; but she soon recovered her liberty, and was married to John de Medici, to whose family she rendered eminent services.

SGRAVESANDER, William Jacob, sygraaf-land (sgr), an eminent Dutch mathematician, who was sent to the university to study the law, and took his doctor's degree there in 1707. But from his earliest years he had evinced a predilection for scientific knowledge, and before he had attained his 19th year, produced an essay on perspective. While practising his profession as a barrister, he continued to make experiments; and, having published some scientific and was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. After his return, he was appointed professor of mathematics at the university of Leyden; and was the first continental professor who taught the Newtonian philosophy. His principal works were, "Introduction to Philosophy," "Elements of Physics," and editions of the "Arithmetica Universalis" of Newton. B. in Holland, 1660. D. 1742.

SHADWELL, Thomas, shad-wel, an English dramatic poet. When Dryden was removed from the office of poet laureate, Shadwell was appointed his successor, which exposed him to the severity of that poet's satire, who ridiculed him under the appellation of MacFlecknoe. Shadwell was, however, a man of genius, and many of his dramatic pieces possess great merit. His principal pieces are, "Epsom Wells," "Timon the Misanthrope," the "Virtuoso," the "Gentleman of Alostia," and the "Lancashire Witches." Dryden, his rival, thus speaks of him; but with more point than truth:—

"Mature in dulness from his tender years, Shadwell alone of all my sons is he Who stands confirm'd in full stupidity:
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence;

But Shadwell never deviates into sense."
Rochester, his patron, more truly estimates his worth:—

"Of all our modern wits, none seem to me
Once to have touch'd upon true comedy,
But hasty Shadwell and slow Wycherley.

It's unfinish'd works do yet impart
The roots of Nature's force, though none of Art."

B. in Norfolk, 1640; D. 1692.

SHAFESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of, shaf'ts-ber-ee, an English statesman, who, at the conclusion of his university career, entered upon public life, in 1640, as the Parliamentary

1653; but, after the death of the Protector, he and Monk operated together to bring about the Restoration. When Charles II. ascended the throne, Sir Anthony was made governor of the Isle of Wight, chancellor of the exchequer, and received other important appointments in acknowledgment of his services. Moreover, he to the peerage, and was one of the commissioners who sat upon the trial of the regicides in 1660. Apparently indifferent to anything like political principle, he was one of the notorious Cabal ministry, through whose conduct of affairs England became involved in a war with Holland. He is, however, acquitted of having taken a portion of the bribes which his associates received at that period from France. He was created earl of Shaftesbury in 1672, and appointed lord chancellor, an office he held with little honour to himself, although he was complimented by Dryden, in Abraham and Achitophel, as follows:—

In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abethlin
With more discerning eyes, nor hands more

The duke of York, afterwards James II., although Shaftesbury appears to have taken considerable pains to conciliate his favour, became his constant opponent, and succeeded in bringing about his dismissal from office in 1673. Subsequently to this event, he entered into opposition, and lent all his energies to the harassing of the court party. His hostility to government led to his being confined during a year in the King's Bench. His afterwards displayed so much eagerness in maintaining the truth of the infamous Titus Oates plot, that some historians have deemed it to be of his own invention. The next great measure in which he participated was in 1679, when he drew up and carried what was then called "Lord Shaftesbury's Act," now famous as the Habeas Corpus Act. His opposition to the succession of the duke of York to the throne, and his intrigues with the duke of Monmouth, led to his being committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason in 1681. The bill of indictment was, however, ignored by the grand jury at the Old Bailey. Perceiving that it was the design of the court to effect his destruction, he endeavoured to form a plot for an armed rebellion; but, not succeeding in drawing his friends along with him in this desperate matter, he, in 1682, fled to Holland. Although an inconsistent and intriguing statesman, he rendered great services to the cause of national liberty. B. at Wimborne St. Giles's, Dorsetshire, 1621; D. at Amsterdam, 1683.

SHAFESBURY, Anthony Cooper, third Earl of, an English philosophical writer, was the grandson of the preceding. He was also the favourite of that statesman, who himself superintended the boy's education, and caused him to acquire a knowledge of both Greek and Latin before he had attained his 11th year, by placing him under a female tutor who spoke both languages with fluency. His after-education was conducted went to Holland. He succeeded to the earldom in the following year, and during the few closing years of William III.'s reign, distinguished himself by his eloquence in the House of Lords. Subsequently to the accession of Anne, he once more retired to Holland, but returned to his native country in two years; after which he devoted himself to literature. His most important works were, "Letter on Enthusiasm;" "Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody;" "Sensus Communis, or Essay on Wit and Humour;" "Soliloquy, or Advice to an Author;" and "Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times." Of this writer Warburton says: "The noble author of the 'Characteristics' had many excellent qualities, both as a man and as a writer. He was temperate, chaste, honest, and a lover of his country. In his writings he has shown how much he has imbibed the deep sense, and how naturally he could copy the gracious manner of Plato." s. in London, 1671; p. at Naples, 1713.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, seventh Earl of, a modern statesman and philanthropist, completed his education at Christ Church, Oxford, and entered the House of Commons in 1826, as the representative of Woodstock. In the interval 1828-30 he was a commissioner of the Board of Control, and was a lord of the Admiralty in the administration of Sir Robert Peel, 1834-5. As Lord Ashley he took charge of the Ten Hours Bill, and supported Sir Robert Peel in his measures with regard to the corn laws. The death of his father, in 1851, caused his accession to the peerage. He was an earnest and influential member of the "evangelical party" of the Established Church, and distinguished himself by his support of any movement or society which had for its object to ameliorate the condition of the uneducated or neglected classes. He was a conspicuous member of the Labourers' Friend and the Ragged School Societies; exercised great influence in the religious world, and was president of the Bible and the Church Pastoral Aid Societies, and of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. p. 1801.

SHAH-AZIM I., shah-azim, emperor of India, succeeded his father, Aurangzebe, in 1707. His short reign was chiefly spent in contesting the throne with his two brothers, Azim and Cambaksh, who had been left the kingdoms of Bejapoor and the Deccan. Both these ambitious princes were defeated and slain in succession. Meer Hussein-Khan, an eminent native historian, thus describes his character:—"This emperor was extremely good-natured, and mild even to a fault; but very deficient in firmness, for which quality, indeed, the princes of the house of Timour have never been remarkable in later times." p. 1712.

SHAH-AZIM II. became nominally emperor in 1759. Unable to maintain his rule over the decaying empire, he in 1765 sought the protection and assistance of the British, who assured him the possession of the city and district of Allahabad, and in return were granted Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, which territories formed the nucleus of the Anglo-Indian empire. His anxiety to re-establish himself in Delhi, the old seat of the Mogul empire, caused him to enter into an alliance with the Mahrattas in 1771 but these turbulent and ambitious chieftains soon reduced him to the condition of a captive. When Delhi was taken in 1783 by Gholam Khadir, a Rohilla chief, Shah-Azim was deprived of his sight. In 1803, Lord Lake captured Delhi; whereupon the unhappy representative of the Mogul emperors became an English state-pensioner. p. 1806.

SHAH-JEHAN, je'-han, or "king of the world," the title taken by Khurram-Shah, fifth Mogul emperor of India. He succeeded to the throne in 1627, and subdued the kingdom of Ahmednuggur, compelled the states of Bejapoor and Golconda to pay tribute, and commenced a fresh war in the Deccan; but, being prostrated by sickness in 1657, his four sons broke into revolt against his authority, and fought between themselves for the succession. Two of them, Aurangzebe and Mourad, united their forces against the elder brother, who was defeated and put to death by Aurangzebe. The two remaining brothers were subsequently got rid of by the same prince, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and kept his father captive in Agra. (See AURANGZEBE.) Shah-Jehan was a wise and humane monarch, and, says Tavernier, "reigned not so much as a king over his subjects, but rather as a father over his family and children." It was during his reign, which was the most brilliant period of the Mogul dynasty, that the famous "peacock throne," the jewels set in which were valued at £6,500,000, was constructed. He also built the city of Shahjehanabad or New Delhi; and the famous Taj Mahal at Agra, as a tomb for his favourite queen. p. at Agra, 1698.

SHAH KOKH BEHADIR, rok be-ha-dir, the fourth son and successor of Tamerlane, defeated the Turcoman prince Kara Yousouf and his sons, restored the fortress of Herat in 1416, and rebuilt the city itself, which had been destroyed by his father. He appointed two of his sons governors of Mawarannahar (or the country beyond the Oxus) and of Persia; while he took with him a third as his subordinate in his Indian campaigns. p. at Ray, Persia, 1448.

SHAKSPEARE, William, shak'-sper, the greatest poet of England. It is to be regretted that the materials for Shakspeare's life should be so lamentably deficient. Though it is not entirely true, as Stevens, one of the editors of his works, declares, that "all that is known with any degree of certainty is, that he was born at Stratford-upon-Avon, married, and had children there; went to London, where he commenced actor, and wrote poems and plays; returned to Stratford, made his will, died, and was buried;"—it must, nevertheless, be admitted that the only foundation we possess whereon to build a biography of the poet, are a few parish registers, wills, and title-deeds. As Mr. Hallam truly observes, "All that insatiable curiosity and unwearied diligence have detected about Shakspeare, serves rather to disappoint and perplex than to furnish the slightest illustration of his character." It is not the register of his baptism, or the draft of his will, or the orthography of his name, that we seek. No letter of his writing, no record of his conversation, no character of him, drawn with any fulness by a contemporary, can be produced. The account of Shakspeare's life which has been most commonly accepted, is that given by Rowe, who wrote it mainly from the statements and anecdotes which Betterton the actor collected while upon a visit to Stratford, in the beginning of the last century. As it is impossible to give a place in this article to the various theories of the many commentators upon Shakspere's biography, it will be best to follow Rowe, but afterwards to indicate what portions of his statement are erroneous, according to the discoveries of the most diligent of recent inquirers. Rowe says the poet's father, "who was a considerable dealer in wool," had so large a family—ten children in all—that, though William was his eldest son, he could give him but a scanty education. He was, indeed, for some time at the grammar-school at Stratford, where he learnt the rudiments of the Latin language, but was prevented from making any further progress by being taken home to follow his father's business. While he was yet very young, he married the daughter of one Hathaway, a substantial farmer in the neighbourhood. In this kind of settlement he continued till, by an act of folly and dissipation, he was obliged to leave the country and his family. He had, by a misfortune common to young fellows, fallen into bad company, and amongst them some who were in the practice of deer-stealing. By them he was prevailed upon, more than once, to engage in robbing the park of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford. For this, continues Rowe, he was prosecuted by that gentleman, as he thought somewhat too severely, and in order to avenge that ill-usage, he made a ballad upon him, which is said to have been so bitter that the prosecution was redoubled, and he was obliged to leave his business and family in Warwickshire for some time, and seek shelter in London. Here he formed an acquaintance with the players, and was enrolled among them, as his name is in the list of performers prefixed to several old plays, though what sort of characters he performed does not appear. Mr. Rowe observes that he never could meet with any further account of him as an actor than that his highest part was the Ghost in his own "Hamlet." We are equally ignorant which was the first play he wrote, though the dates of many of his pieces are easily fixed by particular passages. Queen Elizabeth had several of his plays acted before her, and, without doubt, presented him with many marks of her favour. She was so pleased with the character of Falstaff in the two parts of "Henry IV.," that she commanded him to exhibit the knight in love; on which occasion Shakspere wrote his rich and admirable comedy of the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The earl of Southampton was his particular friend, and hearing that he had an inclination to make a purchase, but wanted the means, he generously sent him £1000. Shakspere was also very intimate with Ben Jonson, who gives him a high character, in his "Discoveries." After conducting the theatre many years with great reputation, he retired to his native place, where his wit and good nature introduced him to the acquaintance of the gentlemen in the neighbourhood. Thus far Rowe, the earliest biographer of the great poet; but the new circumstances of Shakspere's life and ancestry, which have been made known, would seem to prove that John Shakspere, the father, was a small landed proprietor who cultivated his own soil; that when Shakspere was recalled from school in order to assist his father, the family consisted not of ten but of five children. Malone assumes that the means of John Shakspere had become straitened; but the story of the poet's having been taken home from school before he had "attained a proficiency in the Latin language," was evidently conceived to fit a theory long maintained, but now being rapidly exploded,—that Shakspere's works manifest an "ignorance of the ancients." How much more rational is the following hypothesis, taken from the "English Cyclopædia," and written probably by Mr. Charles Knight himself, the author of the best life of Shakspere that we possess?—"The free school of Stratford was founded in the reign of Henry VI., and received a charter from Edward VI. It was open to all boys natives of the borough, and, like all the grammar-schools of that age, was under the direction of men who, as graduates of the universities, were qualified to diffuse that scholarship which was once the boast of England. We have no record of Shakspere having been at this school; but there can be no rational doubt that he was educated there. His father could not have procured for him a better education anywhere. It is perfectly clear to those who have studied his works (without being influenced by prejudices which have been most carefully cherished, implying that he received a very narrow education) that they abound with evidences that he must have been solidly grounded in the learning—properly so called—which was taught in the grammar-schools. As he did not adopt any one of the learned professions, he probably, like many others who have been forced into busy life, cultivated his early scholarship only so far as he found it practically useful, and had little leisure for unnecessary display. His mind was too large to make a display of anything. But what professed scholar has ever engrafted Latin words upon our vernacular English with more facility and correctness? And what scholar has ever shown a better comprehension of the spirit of antiquity than Shakspere in his Roman plays?" The information which Bettonton collected and Rowe made use of, as to the early marriage of the poet, has been proved to be correct. William Shakspere and Anne Hathaway were married in 1542, the poet being then eighteen and a half and Anne twenty-six years old. The stories that Sh. . . ., when a boy, followed his father's trade of a butcher, and that when he "killed a calf, he would do it in high style and make a speech,"—that he had been a schoolmaster, a lawyer's clerk,—that he had stolen Sir Thomas Lucy's deer,—that, after going to London he held the horses of those who rode to the theatre during the performances, were Stratford traditions, which commentators endeavour to explain away by diverse means. Malone disposes of the deer-stealing tradition by affirming that there was no park at Charlecote at the time, and that, consequently, there was no "local habitation" for the stolen deer. Again, it is urged that, until Shakspere drew the rich and intellect classes there by his works, they did not visit the theatre at all, and that those frequenters of the playhouse who found pleasure in the rude and unrefined entertainments there provided, we too poor to keep horses. Much nearer the truth would appear to be the London tradition, preserved by old Aubrey, who says, "This William, being naturally inclined to poetry and acting, came to London, I guess about eighteen, and did act exceedingly well. . . . He began early to make essays at dramatic poetry, which at that time was very low, and his plays took well." According to this view, we may imagine the young man, not holding horses, but boldly attempting to bestride Pegasus, and by engaging in the composition of his poems of "The Rape of Lucrece" and "Venus and Adonis," for which he had models in Chaucer and Spenser, fitting himself for that greater task, his dramas, for which he had no printed models, but only nature, which lay all before him. Pursuing the same theory, we may imagine the young man first acquiring a footing in the theatre, as a poet of whose talents, both as an actor and playwright, his fellow-townsmen and countrymen, Burbage and Greene, leading actors and shareholders of the Blackfriars Theatre, were anxious to avail themselves. But it is assumed that, because no mention had been made of him as an author till about 1692, he had not produced any of his plays before that date. It is, at any rate, certain that, from 1589 he had been a shareholder in the theatre, and moreover a man of importance among his friends and fellows. It is not necessary here to enter upon the controversy relative to the dates of Shakspeare's plays. It has been ascertained beyond doubt, however, that his first printed drama was "The First Part of the Contention" (Henry VI., Part II.), which was in 1594. In 1597 he purchased the best house in his native town, called by Dagdale "a fair house, built of brick and timber." This is the purchase which the Earl of Southampton is said to have enabled him to make by presenting him with £1000; but at the period in question he had become a man of substance, was an important shareholder in both the Globe and Blackfriars theatres, and was beyond the need of such prodigal bounty. After the accession of James I. to the English throne, in 1603, Shakspeare, apparently desirous of retiring from his profession of an actor, is thought to have applied for the mastership of the queen's revels, and to have been the person spoken of in the following letter from Sir Thomas Egerton to the lord-keeper:—"It seemeth to my humble judgment that one who is the author of plays now daily presented on the public stages of London, and the possessor of no small gains, could not with reason pretend to be master of the queen's majesty's revels; forasmuch as he would sometimes be asked to approve and allow of his own writings." Daniel, a contemporary poet, obtained the appointment. About 1604 he is supposed to have retired to Stratford, where, during the last twelve years of his life, he is surmised to have produced "Lear," "Julius Caesar," "Coriolanus," "Cymbeline," "The Tempest," the "Winter's Tale," and others of his plays. In the "Diary of the Rev. John Ward, Vicar of Stratford-upon-Avon," recently discovered in the library of the Medical Society of London, the following entries were found:—"I have heard that Mr. Shakspeare was a natural wit, without any art at all. He frequented the plays all his younger time, but in his elder days lived at Stratford, and supplied the stage with two plays every year, and for it had an allowance so large that he spent at the rate of £1000 a year, as I have heard. Shakspeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry-making, and, it seems, drank too hard; for Shakspeare died of a fever there contracted." These entries were made at least thirty-four years after the great poet's death, and were probably exaggerated statements. With regard to the spelling of his name, it cannot be positively ascertained whether the signatures to his will are Shakspeare or Shak-peare; but in a copy of Florio's "Montaigne," in the British Museum, it is unmistakably Shakspeare. n. at Stratford-upon-Avon, Warwickshire, 1584; n. at the same place, 1616.

SHAMOUL, sha-mool, an Arabian mathematician and physician, who wrote, among other works, one attacking the Jews, whom he charged with interpolating the Mosaic Scriptures. B. 1200; d. 1273.

SHANFARAH, shan-fa-ra', an Arabian poet, who was the author of the oldest poem extant in Arabic. He also rendered his name famous among his countrymen as a swift runner. His poem has been translated by Sylvestre de Sacy, and included in the "Chrestomathie Arabe." He flourished before Mohámmad.

SHARP, James, sharp, a Scotch prelate, who, soon after the Restoration, was advanced to the rebbishopric of St. Andrews, and had the management of ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland; but his conduct gave so much offence to the Jovenanters and Presbyterians, that he was dragged from his coach and murdered by nine assassins in 1679. B. at the castle of Banff, 618.

SHARP, Dr. John, an English prelate, who became chaplain to Charles II. and afterwards to James II. He was suspended in 1686, but was restored to his functions in the following year. He secured the favour of William III., and in 1691 was made archbishop of York. In 1702 he preached the sermon at the coronation of Queen Anne, with whom he subsequently acquired great influence. He is said to have been one of those who prevented the elevation of Swift to a bishopric. B. at Bradford, Yorkshire, 1644; d. at Bath, 1714.

SHARP, Abraham, an English mechanist and astronomical calculator, who, while employed as the keeper of a day-school at Liverpool, taught himself mathematics and astronomy, and occupied his leisure in the construction of instruments. He afterwards went to London, where, in 1688, he was engaged by Flamsteed, the Royal Astronomer, to mount instruments at the Greenwich Observatory. After rendering some important services at that establishment, he retired to Horton, in Yorkshire, where he fitted up an observatory, constructing his own lenses, telescopes, and other apparatus himself. The remainder of his life was spent in assisting Flamsteed, Dr. Halley, Sir Jonas Moore, and other mathematicians, in their calculations. He contributed to the "Historia Cælestis" of Flamsteed, and in 1717 produced a treatise entitled "Geometry Improved." B. at Little Horton, near Bradford, Yorkshire, 1651; d. 1742.

SHARP, Thomas, an English divine, philologist and antiquary, published some works, which, after his death, were collected into 6 vols. in 1773. B. about 1693; d. 1768.

SHARP, Granville, an English writer and advocate for the abolition of negro slavery. He was the son of the preceding, and was educated for the bar, but never practised. He wrote several excellent works upon law, philology, &c.; but it was as an opponent of negro slavery that he became known, both by his writings and by his conduct upon a particular occasion, when he protected a negro against his master, by whom he had been brought to England. The case was brought before the lord mayor, and, notwithstanding the decision of that magistrate, the master seized and would not surrender his slave. Sharp then brought an action against the master, and, in the end, twelve judges declared it to be the law of the land, that when a slave sets foot on English territory he is free. Sharp also wrote against the war with the Americans, the impressment of seamen, &c. n. 1734; d. 1813.

SHARPE, Gregory, an eminent oriental scholar and able divine, was educated at Westminster and Aberdeen, and eventually became master of the Temple. Among his writings are, "A Review of the Controversy on the Demoniacs," "Defence of Dr. Clarke against the Attacks of Leibnitz," "Dissertations on the Origin of Languages and the Powers of Letters, with a Hebrew Lexicon," "Dissertations on the Latin and Greek Tongues," "Three Discourses in Defence of Christianity," an "Introduction to Universal History," and "The Rise and Fall of the City and Temple of Jerusalem." 1713; d. 1771.

SHAW, Thomas, an English divine and celebrated traveller, who, after taking orders, was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Algiers, and resided there during twelve years. He published his "Travels in Syria, Palestine, and Egypt." It is a work of great value, and has been several times reprinted. He subsequently became principal of Edmund Hall, Oxford. n. at Kendal, Westmoreland, about 1693; d. 1751.

SEAW, Cuthbert, an English poet, who published, in 1756, a work called "Liberty." He was at that period engaged as usher in a school at Darlington, but removed to London and thence to Bury, where he entered into the Norwich company of players. He published, in 1760, under the name of Seymour, "Odes on the Four Seasons." In 1762 he attacked Lloyd, Churchill, Colman, and Shirley, in a poem entitled "Four Parting Candles." In 1766 he published "The Race, a Poem," in which he satirized the chief poets of that period. About this time he wrote an account of the virtues of a medicine called the Quaine de Vie, of which he was a proprietor. n. at Ravensworth, Yorkshire, 1738; d. 1771.

SHAW, Peter, an eminent English physician, who lectured upon medicine and chemistry with considerable success, and became physician to George II. He published editions of the works of Robert Boyle and Roger Bacon. His "Lessons in Chemistry" was at one time a very popular book, and was translated into French. n. about 1695; d. 1753.

SHAW, George, an eminent English divine, physician, and naturalist, who was educated at Oxford, and took holy orders in 1774; but subsequently repaired to Edinburgh, in order to study natural science. In 1787 he became doctor of medicine. He assisted at the formation of the Linnean Society in 1788, and was appointed vice-president. After spending some years in the cultivation of natural science, and as a physician and lecturer, he, in 1791, received the appointment of assistant-keeper of natural history in the British Museum, which post retained until his death. The most important of his works were, "The Naturalist's Miscellany," "General Zoology," and a catalogue of the Linnean Museum, illustrated with fine coloured engravings. n. in Bucklebury, 1751; d. 1813.

SHAW, Sir Martin Archer, aka, an eminent Irish painter, who became president of the Royal Academy. He so early attained a proficiency in drawing, that, at the age of 16, when he was thrown upon his resources by the death of his father, a merchant of Dublin, he was enabled to set up as a portrait painter in the Irish capital. Though he was extensively patronized, he desired to acquire a wider reputation, and accordingly repaired in 1788 to London, where he was introduced by Edmund Burke to Sir Joshua Reynolds. In time he obtained a good practice as a portrait painter, for which occupation his accomplishments and polished manners well qualified him. In 1800 he was elected a R.A., and from that time rose so rapidly in the estimation of his brother that he was knighted upon the same occasion. Though not a great painter, his courtly manners and fluency of speech made him a dignified and efficient president of the artistic body. He wrote a tragedy intended for the stage, but never acted, and some short poetical pieces. n. at Dublin, 1709; d. 1851.

SHERRIN, John, Duke of Buckinghamshire, shif-field, a statesman, who became member of the privy council, and lord chamberlain under James II. He was subsequently created marquis of Normandy by William III., and after the accession of Queen Anne, duke of Buckingham. In the same reign he was also lord privy seal and president of the council. He retired from public affairs at the accession of George I., and henceforth devoted himself to the pursuit of literature. He wrote some poems, an essay on Satire, and miscellaneous essays. He was also the author of some valuable "Memoirs relative to the Revolution of 1688." n. 1699; d. 1721.—His only son, after serving some time in the French army under the Duke of Berwick, retired from the service on account of his health. With him the house of Sherrin became extinct. d. at

Richard Lalor, sheel, an Irish politician and diplomatist, who studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and afterwards in Ireland, where he was called to the bar in 1814. The expenses of his student career were defrayed by the proceeds of five tragedies, the most successful of which was "Adeleide," and in which Miss O'Neill acted the principal part. He also wrote "Sketches of the Irish Bar" for the "New Monthly Magazine." A zealous Roman Catholic, he became a member of the measure proposed for the suppression of which, he, in 1823, together with O'Connell, pleaded at the bar of the House of Lords. In 1829 he was enabled to enter the House of Commons, through the interest of the marquis of Angles, who was at the time lord-lieutenant of Ireland and had observed the powers of the impassioned declaimer. His oratorical powers expanded and ripened in the House of Commons, and in truth paved the way for his entrance into office. He was appointed a commissioner of Greenwich Hospital, and in 1839 became vice-president of the Board of Trade, and a member of the privy council. Upon the return of the Whigs to office, in 1846, Shell became master of the Mint, which office he retained till 1860, at which date he retired from public life. n. at the court of this

SHELburne, William Petty, Earl of shelburne, an English statesman, who, in early life, entered the army and distinguished himself at the battles of Minden and Kampen. When George III. ascended the throne, in 1760, he became the king's aide-de-camp, and subsequently reached the grade of major-general. He succeeded to the earldom of Shelburne in the following year. At first a supporter of Bute, under whom he held office, his views relative to the impolicy of coercing the Americans led to his estrangement from that minister, and to his subsequent attachment to the Earl of Chatham, of whom he became an ardent admirer and unswerving supporter. In 1782 he was called upon to form an administration, and entered office with the declaration that he would adhere to all those "constitutional ideas which for seven years he had imbibed from his master in politics, the late Earl of Chatham." During his ministry, although it extended over only seven months, the siege of Gibraltar came to a glorious termination, and Howe and Rodney won their triumphs upon the seas. He retired from office in 1783, resigning the leadership of his party to William Pitt. He was created marquis of Lansdowne in 1784, and henceforth took little share in public affairs. b. 1737; d. 1805.

SHELDON, Gilbert, an eminent English prelate, who received various preferments, and was appointed clerk of the closet to Charles I., whom he attended in the Isle of Wight, and for his loyalty was deprived of his appointments and imprisoned. At the Restoration he was made dean of the chapel royal and bishop of London. On the death of Archbishop Juxon he was raised to the primacy, in which situation he conducted himself with great zeal for the church, and expended above £88,000 in charitable uses. b. at Staunton, Staffordshire, 1598; d. 1677.

SHELLEY, Percy Bysshe, shel'-le, an eminent English poet, who was the son of Sir Timothy Shelley, and came of an old English family. He was instructed in Greek and Latin by the vicar of the parish of Warnham, in Sussex; but, on attaining his tenth year, was sent to a school at Brentford, which was exchanged for that of Eton three years afterwards. A shy, diffident boy, whose appearance and manners were almost feminine, he was nevertheless of an unconquerable spirit. At Eton he not only improved his knowledge of Greek and Latin, but added French and German to his intellectual stores. He quitted Eton in 1808, and returned to his father's house, where he finished two romances commenced at Eton, and wrote verses to a cousin, with whom he had fallen in love. He proceeded to the university of Oxford in 1810, and in his second year of residence printed an anonymous "Defence of Atheism." The object he seems to have had in view was not so much to express his own opinions, as to excite discussion, and to draw forth the ideas of others upon his thesis. He sent copies of his pamphlet to the heads of colleges, who, having heard that he was the author, summoned him before them. He was requested to state whether he was the author. He declined to do so; but he would not state that he was not. He was expelled, his father refused to see him; upon which he took up his residence in London, where he completed his "Queen Mab." His father becoming reconciled to him, wished him to enter upon a political career, but he soon afterwards incurred his parent's lasting displeasure by marrying, at Gretna, Miss Westbrook, the daughter of a retired hotel-keeper. The match proved as unhappy as it was ill-considered. The young pair were without resources; the lady had no sympathy with his peculiar nature. In 1813 a separation by mutual consent took place. He went abroad in the following year, and visited France, Germany, and Switzerland, in company with Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, whom he subsequently married. The year 1815 was the happiest he had known for some time. His father agreed to allow him an income of £800 a year; and, while residing in Devonshire and at Windsor, he was deeply absorbed with his literary compositions. "Alastor" was produced at this period. In 1816 his wife committed suicide, whereupon Shelley claimed his two children, the issue of this marriage. But his late wife's father commenced a suit in chancery, alleging that Shelley, as one holding atheistical opinions, was unfitted to have charge of his offspring. Lord Chancellor Eldon decided that the children should be committed to Mr. Westbrook's care. He felt this decision to be unjust and tyrannical; and, in the "Revolt of Islam," which was written in 1817, made several allusions to the harsh decree. In the following year he left England, to which he was destined never to return. Milan, Rome, Florence, and Leghorn were his halting-places during the three succeeding years. It was in that interval that he made the acquaintance of Lord Byron, with whom he passed much of his time. In July, 1822, after being absent some days from his house on the Gulf of Spezza, he set sail, in a boat which belonged to himself, in company with his friend Mr. Williams. A squall overtaking the light craft she went down, and the friends perished. His body was afterwards washed ashore; and, in accordance with the laws of Tuscany, that everything so cast up from the sea should be burned, all that was mortal of the poet was consumed to ashes, which were collected, and afterwards placed in the Protestant burying-ground at Rome. Both Lord Byron and Mr. Leigh Hunt were at the last ceremony. In addition to the poems already mentioned, Shelley wrote the tragedy of "The Cenci," "Adonais," a monody upon the death of Keats, "Prometheus," and a number of smaller pieces. b. at Field Place, near Horsham, Sussex, 1792; drowned, 1822.

SHELLEY, Mary Wollstonecraft, an English authoress, and wife of the preceding. While a resident in Italy with her husband, she wrote her remarkable novel, entitled "Frankenstein." After the poet's death, she produced "The Last Man," "Falkland," "Rambles in Germany and Italy;" and in 1839 made a collected edition of Shelley's works, to which she added some judicious notes, and a selection from the poet's letters. She was the daughter of the celebrated William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft. b. 1795; d. in London, 1851.

SHENSTONE, William, shen'-stone, an English poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, spent some time in travelling. Subsequently he retired to his paternal estate at Hales-Owen, which he greatly improved and ornamented. His works consist of songs, elegies, pastorals; a poem in Spenser's manner, entitled "The Schoolmistress;" letters, and miscellaneous essays. "The general recommendation of Shenstone," says Dr. Johnson, "is easiness and simplicity." n. at Hales-Owen, Shropshire, 1714; p. 1763.

SHERBURN, Sir Edward, sher'-burn, an English writer, who succeeded, on his father's death, to the office of clerk of the ordnance. He was imprisoned for some time by the Parliament, and, on recovering his liberty, joined the king, whom he served with great bravery, for which he lost his estates. After the battle of Edgehill, he went to Oxford, where he was created master of arts. At the Restoration he recovered his place, and was knighted. He translated two of Seneca's tragedies into English, the "Sphere" of Marcus Manlius, and other works, and wrote a volume of poems. b. in London, 1618; d. at the same place, 1702.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, sher'-i-dan, an Irish divine and poet, who, at the conclusion of his educational career at the university of Dublin, set up a school in that city, and afterwards was master of one at Cavan, which he sold, as he also did a living procured for him by Dean Swift, with whom he was in close intimacy. He was an improvident man; but, says Lord Cork, "his pen and fiddlestick were in continual motion." He translated into verse the "Satires" of Persius and the "Philocetes" of Sophocles. b. in Ireland, 1694; d. 1734.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, an eminent lexicographer, son of the preceding, was educated at Westminster school, and next at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took a degree in arts. The death of his father leaving him without resources, he, in 1743, appeared on the stage in the character of Richard III. The year following he performed at Covent Garden Theatre. He afterwards became manager of the Dublin theatre, and, at a later period, an itinerant lecturer on elocution. He obtained a pension from George II., and, in 1767, produced at the Haymarket an entertainment of reading, singing, and music, called "An Attic Evening." He also performed at the same theatre and at Covent Garden; but abandoned the profession of an actor in 1776. The same year he succeeded Garrick as manager of Drury-lane Theatre, which position he resigned in 1779. He now returned to his literary labours, and to delivering occasional lectures. His principal works are, "A Dictionary of the English Language," one object of which was to establish a plain and permanent standard of pronunciation, "Lectures on the Art of Reading," "British Education; or, the Source of the Disorders of Great Britain;" "Life of Swift," prefixed to his works. b. at Quiln, Ireland, 1721; d. 1788.—His wife Frances, whose maiden name was Chamberlayne, was an accomplished woman, and wrote "Sidney Biddulph," a novel; a romance entitled "Nourjahad;" and "The Discovery," a comedy. b. 1724; d. at Wals, 1794.

SHERIDAN, Richard Brinsley, an eminent Irish dramatist, who was the son of the preceding. After being at school in Dublin, he was sent to Harrow, which establishment he quitted with the character of an "impenetrable dunce," who wrote "think" for "thing." He commenced life by eloping to France with Miss Linley, a popular singer, whom, in 1773, he secretly married. During the first years of his marriage he appears to have subsisted upon a sum of £3000, "which a good-natured old gentleman had settled upon Miss Linley, in default of being able to marry her." In 1775, however, he directed his attention towards literature, and produced his comedy of "The Rivals," which, upon the first representation, was unsuccessful, but subsequently became popular. The farce of "St. Patrick's Day" was his second production, which was quickly followed by the "Duenna," according to Hazlitt, "a perfect work of art: the songs are the best that were ever written, except those in the 'Beggar's Opera.' They have a joyous spirit of intoxication in them, and strains of the most melting tenderness." He suddenly became a proprietor of Drury-lane Theatre; but whence he derived the money necessary to take that step has never been shown. In 1777 he slightly altered Vanbrugh's comedy of "The Relapse," and put it upon the stage under the title of "A Trip to Scarborough." In the same year also he brought out "The School for Scandal," of which Leigh Hunt observes, "With the exception of too great a length of dialogue without action in its earlier scenes, it is a very concentration and crystallization of all that is sparkling, clear, and compact in the materials of pure comedy." The fine farce called "The Critic" was written in 1779. Of it Leigh Hunt remarks, that it is "in some of its most admired passages little better than an exquisite cento of the wit of the satirists before him. Sheridan must have felt himself emphatically at home in a production of this kind; for there was every call in it upon the powers he abounded in—wit, banter, and style, and none upon his good-nature." Through the interest of Fox, he was enabled to enter the House of Commons in 1780. He gave a warm and consistent support to the Whig party, and during the marriage of Rockingham's administration held the office of under-secretary of state; but he possessed none of the high qualities of a statesman, and as a debater he "gradually degenerated into a useless though amusing speaker, familiarly joked at by the public, admired but disesteemed by his friends." Nevertheless, his speech upon the impeachment of Warren Hastings will always be remembered as a noble specimen of oratory. His wife died in 1792, and years he married the daughter of the dean of Winchester, who was "young, accomplished, and ardently devoted to him." He now sold his share in the Drury-lane Theatre for £15,000; to this was added £5000 obtained with his wife; and with the whole an estate in Surrey was purchased. Last productions were "The Stranger" and "Pizarro," both adaptations from the works of Kotzebue. But the end was approaching: always more or less embarrassed by pecuniary difficulties, his failing health and departed youth left him in constant fear of bailiffs, or caused him to shrink from duels whose patience was long exhausted, and whom in earlier years he would have parted with a facility entirely his own. Now that his flashes of wit were extinguished by sickness and distress, he was no longer the welcome boon-companion of the pompous and heartless Prince-regent. His whole life had been dramatic; in the heyday of his strength and brilliancy it was comedy; but the end closely approached the tragic. He expired near his dying wife. There is a complete edition of his works by Leigh Hunt, who affixed to it a critical and biographical sketch.

SIDNEY, SIR PHILIP.

Sheridan

His life was also written by the poet Moore; while some excellent criticism upon his fine comedies is to be found in the "Lectures on the Comic Writers," by Hazlitt. B. at Dublin, 1751; D. in London, 1816.

SHERIDAN, Philip Henry, an able general of the United States army, who was engaged in several battles of the American war of 1861-65 with various success. In 1864 he defeated General Early in the valley of the Shenandoah, and after gaining the battle of Five Forks in 1865, shared in driving General Lee from Richmond and compelling him to surrender. B. in Ohio, 1831.

SHERLOCK, William, a learned English divine, who, among other preferments, obtained the mastership of the Temple. He displayed great zeal and ability against popery in the reign of James II., but for some time scrupled to take the oaths to King William. He at last complied, and published an apology for his conduct, which was severely animadverted on by the nonjurors. He was preferred to the deanery of St. Paul's, and had a long controversy with Dr. South on the doctrine of the Trinity. B. in London, 1641; D. 1707.

SHERLOCK, Thomas, an eminent English prelate, and son of the preceding, was educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow and afterwards became master. He succeeded his father in the mastership of the Temple. In the controversy excited by Bishop Hoadley on the constitution of the Church, Dr. Sherlock bore a conspicuous part. He was successively dean of Chichester, bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London, and was offered the see of Canterbury, which he declined. His sermons rank among the first in the English language. B. in London, 1678; D. 1761.

SHERMAN, William Tecumseh, sher'-man, a general of the United States army, who took Atlanta in 1864, and then made his celebrated march from Atlanta to Savannah, on the coast of Georgia. Like Sheridan, he shared in the operations before and around Richmond, which induced Lee to surrender, and brought the Great American civil war to a close. B. in Ohio, about 1820.

SHIELD, William, sheeld, an eminent English musical composer, who was the son of a teacher of singing; but, losing his father, was apprenticed to a boat-builder as a means of assuring him his future subsistence. The lad's predilection for music was, however, strongly exhibited, and throughout his apprenticeship he studied the art assiduously. Having been fortunate to attract the notice of the celebrated Avison, he made so much progress under his tuition as to be able to compose an anthem for the consecration of a new church at Sunderland. This piece was greatly admired, and brought its author into notice. He repaired to London, where he was engaged in the orchestra of the King's theatre during twenty years. In 1783, his opera of "Rosina" was performed with the most brilliant success at Covent Garden. This was followed by the "Poor Soldier," "Robin Hood," "The Farmer," and other operas. In 1791 he visited France and Italy, and in 1807 retired from all theatrical engagements, resolving to devote himself to the production of works on the theory and practice of music. The most important of these valuable productions were, "Introduction to Harmony" and "Rudiments of Thorough Bass." B. at Smallwell, Durham, 1749; D. in London, 1829. His remains was interred in Westminster Abbey.

Shovel

SHIRLEY, Sir Anthony, shir'-le, an English writer, who became Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. After studying some time in the inns of court, he went to Holland, under Sir Philip Sidney. In 1596 he made a voyage to America, and was afterwards with the earl of Essex in Ireland, where he was knighted. On going abroad, he was received at several courts, particularly that of Spain, where he was made admiral of the fleet, and a grandee. James I. ordered him to return, but he refused. He wrote a "Voyage to America," in Hakluyt's Collections; "Account of Muley Hamet's Rising in the Kingdom of Morocco;" History of his "Travels into Persia;" "Voyage over the Caspian Sea, and through Russia," in Purchas's Pilgrims; and History of his "Ambassages." B. at Weston, Sussex, 1565; D. in Spain, 1630.

SHIRLEY, Robert, an English traveller, brother of the preceding, who settled in Persia, where he was held in such high esteem by the emperor, that he was sent as his ambassador to Spain, and afterwards to England. B. about 1570; D. in Persia, 1623.

SHIRLEY, James, an English dramatic writer, who, after completing his degrees in arts at Cambridge, entered into orders; but subsequently embraced the Roman Catholic faith, and became a schoolmaster in London. He and his wife both died on the same day, of a fright occasioned by the fire of London, in 1666. He wrote thirty-nine plays, a volume of poems, and some school-books. B. in London, about 1594.

SHISHKOV, Alexander Semenovitch, shis'-kof, a Russian admiral, author, and statesman, who, while in the active pursuit of his profession as a naval officer, translated into Russian prose Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," as also some poems from the German. In 1812 he became secretary to Alexander I., and in that capacity issued a series of patriotic proclamations against Napoleon I. He became president of the Russian Academy in 1816, and in 1824 minister of Public Instruction; but, while fulfilling the duties of this latter office, he displayed a most decided antipathy to the spread of education among the serfs. His most important works are, "Opinion on the Old and New Styles in the Russian Language;" "On the Easiest Way of answering Criticism," said to be the wittiest piece of argumentative composition in the Russian Language; a "Maritime Dictionary," in French, English, and Russian; "Memoirs of the War in 1812," and "Historical Catalogue of all the Vessels in the Russian Fleet, from its Origin," &c. B. 1754; D. 1841.

SHORE, Jane, shor, mistress of Edward IV., was the wife of a goldsmith in Lombard Street; but the king, being enamoured of her charms, enticed her from her husband. On the death of Edward, she lived with Lord Hastings, who was beheaded by order of Richard III., who also caused Jane Shore to be tried for witchcraft. She was accordingly sentenced to do public penance. She died in the reign of Henry VIII., in the extremity of poverty.

SHOVEL, Sir Cloudesley, shuv'-el, a brave English admiral, who came of humble parentage. He went early to sea, and, from being a cabin-boy, rose to the first honours of his profession. In 1674 he served in the Mediterranean, under Sir John Narborough, and did such service by burning the ships in the harbour of Tripoli, that he received a captain's commission. For his gallant conduct against the French at the battle of Bantry Bay, in Ireland, he was knighted by William III., and made rear-admiral. He enacted a distinguished part in the victory of La Hogue, and in that off Malaga in 1704. The year following he had the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean, and contributed to several others, struck upon the rocks of Scilly, and were lost. The body of Sir Cloudeley was discovered and conveyed to Portsmouth, whence it was removed to London, and buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory. b. 1650.

SHRAPNEL, Lieutenant-general Henry, shrap-nel, the inventor of the case-shot known as Shrapnel-shells, received his commission as second lieutenant in the royal artillery in 1770, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1837. On the adoption of his shells by the artillery, General Shrapnel was granted a pension of £1200 per annum in addition to his regular pay. b. 1812.

SIBBALD, Sir Robert, sib-bald, a physician and naturalist, born near Leslie, in Fifeshire, was physician and geographer to Charles II.; and contributed to the foundation of the College of Physicians at Edinburgh, of which he became the first president. Among his works are, "Scotia Illustrata" and "The Liberty and Independence of the Kingdom and Church of Scotland." b. about 1643; d. 1712.

SIBTHORPE, John, sib-thorp, a learned English botanist and physician, who was the son of Dr. Humphrey Sibthorpe, professor of botany at Oxford, in which chair he succeeded his father. He made two voyages to Greece and the neighbouring countries to collect rare plants. His collections were published in a magnificent form, under the title of "Flora Græca." He also produced a "Flora Oxoniensis." b. at Oxford, 1758; d. at Bath, 1790.

SICARD, Roch Ambrose Cucunnon, se'kar, a French abbé, who devoted his life to the education of the deaf and dumb. After having for some time had the care of the institution for the deaf and dumb at Bordeaux, he was, upon a competitive examination, chosen to succeed the Abbé de l'Épée at the Paris institution. In 1791 he was arrested by order of the National Assembly; and, notwithstanding an eloquent appeal made in his behalf by his pupils, was transferred to the prison of the Abbaye, which, at that period, was the preliminary step to the guillotine. When about to be executed, a person named Monnet interposed, saying, "It is the Abbé Sicard, one of the most useful men in the country; you shall run through my body to reach his;" and Sicard himself said, "I am the instructor of the deaf and dumb; and as these unfortunates prevail more among the poor than the rich, I am more to you than to the rich." This speech saved his life. In 1815 he paid a visit to England with two of his favourite pupils, and was cordially received. He wrote several works upon his system of instruction. b. near Toulouse, 1742; d. 1822.

SICINIUS DENTATUS. (See DENTATUS, Lucius Sicinius.)

SIDMONS, Mrs. Sarah, sidd-mons, an eminent English actress, was the sister of John and Charles Kemble, and when little more than an infant, made her first appearance upon the stage, for the benefit of her father, who was a theatrical manager. At the age of eighteen she married a young actor named Siddons. While performing at Cheltenham, she attracted the favourable notice of Lord Bruce and others; upon whose recommendation Garrick engaged her for Drury-lane Theatre, where she made her début in 1775; but incurring the displeasure of the English Roscius, was compelled to retire again to the provinces. Her fame, however, rapidly increased. Henderson, the eminent actor, declared her to be the "finest and best of all actresses; to have in herself all that her predecessors possessed, and all that they wanted. . . . That she would never be surpassed." In 1782 she again appeared at Drury Lane. She made her first appearance in her celebrated part of Lady Macbeth in 1785, and rapidly became the leading actress of the English stage. She retired from the stage in 1812; but re-appeared on some subsequent occasions, for benefits and charities. She gave readings from Shakspere and Milton at a later period, and appeared before Queen Charlotte and the royal family, and at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. b. at Brecon, South Wales, 1755; d. in London, 1831.

SIDMOUTH, Henry Addington, Viscount, sidd-mouth, an English statesman, was the son of an eminent metropolitan physician, and at the termination of his educational career at Oxford, entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1781. His father had been engaged as physician to the Earl of Chatham, and he was thus enabled to gain the acquaintance of William Pitt, through whose interest Addington entered the House of Commons. In 1780 he became the ministerial candidate for the office of speaker, and was elected. Upon the retirement of Pitt, in 1801, he formed a ministry, composed of what were then termed the "king's friends." He held office, but with no great distinction, until 1803, when he was thrown out by Pitt, who succeeded to power in the following year. Acknowledging the superior powers of Pitt, he gave the new ministry his support, and was in 1805 appointed president of the council, and at the same time raised to the peerage as Viscount Sidmouth. It is, however, affirmed that he came to be regarded as a dangerous rival by Pitt, who requested him to resign, which he did. In 1806 he was lord privy seal in the Fox and Grenville administration, and soon afterwards became president of the council on the re-constitution of the same cabinet. After remaining out of office during five years, he again became president of the council, under Perceval; and, upon the assassination of that statesman, in 1812, he accepted the post of secretary of state for the home department in the ministry of Lord Liverpool. This office he held during ten years, and by his conduct relative to the reform meeting at Manchester, in 1819, as well as upon several other occasions, became an object of great unpopularity with the great mass of the people. He resigned this appointment in 1822; but, at the urgent request of his chief, he retained a seat in the cabinet until 1824, at which time he made his final retirement from public life. b. 1757; d. 1 of knighthood, and sent him as ambassador to France. In the succeeding reign he was appointed collector of the revenues in Ireland, and in that of Elizabeth, lord-president of the Marches of Wales, and knight of the Garter. In 1568 he was constituted lord-deputy of Ireland. He caused the statutes of Ireland to be printed, and is stated, by Spenser and Sir John Davies, to have wisely governed that country. Sir R. Naunton, in the "Fragmenta Regalia," speaks of him as a "man of great parts." B. in Surrey, about 1519; D. 1586.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, a chivalrous English soldier and poet, who in his 15th year was sent to Christ Church College, Oxford, and at the age of 17 went on his travels. He was in Paris during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and was obliged to take refuge in the abode of Sir Francis Walsingham, the English ambassador. After visiting various cities in Hungary, Italy, and Germany, he, in 1575, returned to England, and in the following year Queen Elizabeth appointed him ambassador to the emperor Rudolph, at whose court he contracted an intimacy with the famous Don John of Austria. On account of his declaring his sentiments freely against the queen's marriage with the Duke of Anjou, in 1580, in his "Remonstrance" to her majesty, he retired from court, and in his retreat wrote his celebrated romance, called "Arcadia," and his "Defence of Poesie." In 1583 he received the honour of knighthood, and in 1585 was appointed governor of Flushing, and general of the troops sent to the assistance of the United Provinces. About this time, his reputation for wisdom and valour stood so high, that he was thought a fit person to be a candidate for the crown of Poland; but the queen would not consent to the loss of "the jewel of her dominions." In September, 1586, Sir Philip displayed extraordinary bravery at the battle of Zutphen, but received a mortal wound in the thigh as he was mounting his third horse, having had two slain under him previously. His conduct while leaving the battle-field illustrates his noble character. It is thus described by his biographer, Lord Brook:—"In which sad progress, passing along by the rest of the army, where his uncle the general (the Earl of Leicester) was, and being thirsty with excess of bleeding, he called for some drink, which was presently brought him; but as he was putting the bottle to his mouth, he saw a poor soldier carried along, who had eaten his last at the same feast, ghastly casting up his eyes at the bottle; which, Sir Philip perceiving, took it from his head before he drunk, and delivered it to the poor man with these words: 'Thy necessity is yet greater than mine.'" This wound proved fatal twenty-five days afterwards. His body was brought home and buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. In addition to the work already mentioned, Sir Philip wrote Sonnets, "Urania, a poem," and several other pieces. B. at Penshurst, Kent, 1554; D. 1586.

SIDNEY, Mary, Countess of Pembroke, was the sister of the preceding, and possessed kindred talents, which she assiduously cultivated. She wrote an "Elegy" on her lamented brother, a "Pastoral Dialogue in Praise of Queen Elizabeth," and a "Discourse of Life and Death." D. 1621.

SIDNEY, Algernon, an English statesman and political martyr, was the son of Robert, second Earl of Leicester, and distinguished himself at the beginning of the civil wars by his opposition to Charles I.; became a colonel in the Parliamentary army, and avowed himself a republican. He was nominated one of the king's judges, but was absent when sentence was passed upon Charles. Neither did he sign the warrant for the execution of that monarch. When Cromwell assumed the title of Protector, Sidney retired into private life. At the Restoration he went abroad, but returned in 1667, on obtaining a pardon, the condition of which was that he should conduct himself as a peaceable subject. In 1683 he was apprehended on charge of being concerned in the Rye-house Plot, tried before Judge Jeffries, and most illegally sentenced to death. This sentence was reversed in the first Parliament of William and Mary. He wrote discourses concerning government, in which he places the origin and right of power in the people, and other works. Bishop Burnet speaks of Sidney "as a man of most extraordinary courage; a steady man even to obstinacy; sincere, but of a rough and boisterous temper, that could not bear contradiction, but would give foul language upon it." D. 1621 or 1622; executed 1683.

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, si-do-ni-us, a primitive prelate, and Latin poet, was the son-in-law of the emperor Avitus, on whom he wrote a panegyric of 600 verses. After discharging several high civil offices at Rome, he was chosen bishop of Arvern, now Clermont, in 472, which office he discharged so well as to be accounted the oracle of France. His epistles, poems, and other works, were printed by Sirmondus, with notes, in 1614. B. at Lyons, 430; D. 488.

SIEGEN, Ludwig von, se'-gen, the inventor of mezzotint engraving, was descended of an ancient Westphalian family, and became a page to one of the princes of Hesse. The new method of engraving is supposed to have been discovered between 1637 and 1641; but it has been positively ascertained that Siegen sent to the landgrave of Hesse a proof of his mother's portrait in 1642, and that this was the first impression ever taken from a plate engraved after the mezzotint manner. Upon the conclusion of the Thirty Years' War, in 1648, he retired from military service, in which he had been engaged, and devoted his leisure to perfecting the new art. He made the acquaintance of Prince Rupert at Brussels, in 1654, and communicated his discovery to him. After Rupert had taken up his residence in England, he practised mezzotint engraving, and produced a specimen of it for Evelyn's "History of Engraving," wherein it is erroneously stated that the prince was the inventor. Evelyn, who wrote a history of the art, which was intended to be read before the Royal Society, therein stated "that this invention, or new manner of chalcography, was the result of chance, and improved by a German soldier, who, espying some serape on the barrel of his musket, and being of an ingenious spirit, refined upon it till it produced the effects you have seen." The statement made by Evelyn was the origin of the account, long believed, that Prince Rupert was the inventor of the art. Siegen produced a number of engravings of royal portraits. B. at Utrecht, 1600; D. subsequently to 1676.

SIEYES, Emmanuel Joseph, Count, se'-ai, usually styled the "Abbé Sieyès," a celebrated French political philosopher and consul of the republic, was educated for the ecclesiastical profession, and rose to the position of vicar-general and chancellor of the diocese of Chartres. But, from an early period of his life, his mind was strongly disposed towards the study of politics; and, some time before the Revolution of 1789, he evinced his participation in those ideas which were to prove the destruction of the monarchy and government. When Louis XVI. summoned the States-general, Sieyes produced three pamphlets upon the questions of the day, which were read with avidity, and were the means of making a political celebrity of their author. He was elected deputy for Paris; and, upon the refusal of the nobility and clergy to unite with the "Tiers Etat," he boldly counselled the people's representatives to form themselves into an independent body. The National Assembly thus sprang into existence. In the subsequent proceedings, which resulted in the Revolution, Sieyes played a prominent and energetic part. It would appear, however, that he did not fully comprehend the alarming tendencies of the innovations of which he had been so eloquent an advocate; for, on expressing his disapprobation of some of the Assembly's decrees, Mirabeau replied to him, "You have unloosed the bull, and you complain that it gores you." In 1791 he was offered, but refused, the appointment of constitutional bishop of Paris. During his lifetime, and indeed until quite recently, he lay under the stigma of pronouncing himself for the death of Louis XVI., with the sarcasm, "La mort sans phrase" (Death without phrases). It has been proved, however, that, although he was among those who voted for the death of the French monarch, he did so in silence. During the Reign of Terror, he prudently retired from the capital; and, when afterwards asked what had been his conduct in that terrible interval, he replied, "I have lived." At the death of Robespierre, he reappeared and regained his former high position. An attempt to assassinate him was made in 1797, by the Abbé Poite; but he escaped with a shattered hand. He maintained his imperturbability, however, and quietly said to his servants, "If M. Poite should return, inform him that I am not at home." In the following year he was sent to Berlin, to negotiate a treaty of alliance between France and Prussia, but without success. He became a member of the Directory upon his return. Growing more powerful every day, he was nevertheless an object of the deepest hatred with the ultra-republican party. To strengthen himself against these enemies, he entered into his famous alliance with General Bonaparte. After the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, he was appointed consul, with Bonaparte and Roger Ducos. But the ambitious Corsican soon eclipsed Sieyes, who, accustomed to command, could not obey, and consequently tendered his resignation in 1799. He retired with a reward of 600,000 francs, a grant of land, and a mansion in Paris. He was subsequently offered the presidency of the senate, under the empire, but refused the honour, accepting, however, the title of count. When the Bourbons were restored, Sieyes was exiled; and although he returned to France after the Revolution of 1830, he continued to live in retirement. Dumont thus speaks of him:—"His manner was neither frank nor engaging: he was a man with whom it was difficult to become intimate. . . . I imagined that this friend of liberty had necessarily a liking for the English nation, and, the

.....n was a piece of mere charlatany. . . . In a word, it was manifest that he regarded the English but as children in the art of framing a constitution, and that he deemed himself capable of giving a much better one to France." Indeed, this political philosopher was wont to declare, that, "the art of government was a science which he considered he had brought to perfection." He wrote a number of political works, the most important of which were, "Political Opinions," an "Exposition of the Rights of Man," and "The Preliminary Bases of a Constitution." n. at Frejus, 1748; p. 1836.

SIGAUD DE LAFOND, Jean René, se-go la-faund, an eminent French surgeon, who made several important discoveries in his profession, and wrote some valuable works upon natural philosophy, the chief of which were, "Lessons in Experimental Physics," and "Dictionary of Physics." n. at Dijon, 1740; p. 1810.

SIGEBERT I., seerzh-lair, third son of Clovis of France, who became, in 561, king of Austrasia. He made war upon Chilperic, king of Neustria, and overran a great part of his kingdom, but was assassinated in 575, by Fredegonde, wife of Chilperic.

SIGEBERT II., second son of Dagobert I., king of Austrasia, reigned the direction of affairs to Bishop Cunibert and others. He founded a number of monasteries, and devoted his life to religious duties. His son Dagobert was supplanted by Childbert III. Sigebert set down as a saint in the Romish Calendar.

SIGEBERT, king of the East Angles, is celebrated by Bede as a man of learning and piety. He founded several churches, monasteries, and schools. After abdicating the throne in 641, he became a monk at Eborac Castle, in Suffolk. where he was a ted shortly after.

n. sig-is-mund, emperor of Germany, the son of Charles IV., was crowned king of Hungary in 1346, and elected emperor in 1410. After establishing several constitutional regulations for restoring the peace of the empire, he set about effecting the tranquillity of the Church; for which purpose he prevailed with Pope John XXIII. to convene the Council of Constance in 1414; but he tarnished his character by granting a safe-conduct to John Huss to attend that council, and afterwards suffering him to be executed in violation of it. The Hussites, irritated at this want of faith, rose under the famous Ziska, and gained many advantages over the German forces, and were not reduced till sixteen years afterwards. He sold Brandenburg to Frederick, burgrave of Nür-rg, whom he also created elector. This was the foundation of the kingdom of Prussia. n. 1366; p. at Znaym, Moravia, 1437.

SIGISMUND I., king of Poland, surnamed the Great, was the son of Casimir IV., and elected to the throne in 1606. He employed the first years of his reign in reforming public abuses, and in re-establishing the finances of his kingdom, which had been much disorganized by his prodigal predecessor, Alexander. He drove the Muscovites out of Lithuania, recovered several places from the Teutonic Knights, and expelled the Wallachians who had invaded his terri- n. 1466; p. 1513.

BIOGRAPHY.

Sigismund

SIGISMUND II., surnamed Augustus, was the son and successor of the preceding. During his reign, Livonia was acquired, and the union of Lithuania and Poland effected. b. 1520; d. 1572.

SIGISMUND III. was the son of John III., king of Sweden, and ascended the throne of Poland in 1587, to the exclusion of Maximilian of Austria, who had been elected by the nobility. On the death of his father, he succeeded to the Swedish crown in 1594; but being a zealous Catholic, the Swedes acknowledged his uncle, Charles, duke of Sudermania, who was crowned in 1604. A long war ensued, in which Sigismund was unsuccessful. Muscovy being in a very distracted condition, he dispatched an army into that country, and was at first completely victorious. His son Ladislaus was placed upon the throne; but, through the impolitic measures of Sigismund, the Polish prince was driven from Moscow, Michael Romanoff being elected, to the prejudice of Ladislaus. He was a bigoted Roman Catholic, and entirely under the control of the Jesuits. b. 1586; d. 1632.

SIGONIO, Charles, se-go'-neo, an Italian historian, whose principal works are—an "Ecclesiastical History," a number of works upon Rome, history, and antiquities, and the "History of the Middle Ages." b. about 1520; d. 1594.

SIGOURNEY, Mrs. Lydia Huntly, se-goor'-ne, an American poetess and writer, who made her first appearance as an authoress in 1815, with the publication of a volume entitled "Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse." She became the wife of Mr. Sigourney, an American merchant, in 1819, and, three years afterwards, produced her best poem, "The Aborigines of America." She made a tour in Europe in 1840, and resided for some time in England. An interesting narrative of her travels was published in 1842, after her return to America, under the title of "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands." She has been termed the Hemans of America. b. at Norwich, Connecticut, 1791; d. 1865.

SIXE, or SECKE, Henry, seek, an eminent Dutch Orientalist, who became a professor of Oriental languages, first at Utrecht, and later at Cambridge. He edited an apocryphal gospel, entitled "Evangelium Infantie Christi, adscriptum Thomæ." He hanged himself to escape punishment for some misdemeanour. 1712.

SILKOVETTE, Stephen de, sil'-oo-eh, a French writer, who, after being master of requests to the Duke of Orleans, became comptroller-general of the finances in 1757, but continued in office only eight months, owing to the failure of his schemes of reform and economy, which were turned into ridicule. His most important works were,—"General Idea of the Chinese Government;" "Political Reflections, translated from the Spanish of Græcian;" and translations of Pope's "Essay on Man" and Warburton's "Alliance of Church and State." During his short ministry, his name was much in vogue, and was given to a mode of producing likenesses from the shadow of the face, a practice much in use in his day. b. at Limoges, 1700; d. 1767.

SILIUS ITALICUS, Caius, sil'-i-us i-täl'-i-kus, a Latin poet, who was consul in the last year of Nero's reign, and afterwards governor of the province of Asia. He is said to have become the owner of the villas of Cicero and Virgil. He wrote a poem upon the second Punic war, entitled "Punica," which, it is said, was discovered by Poggio Bracciolini, in the monastery of St. Gallen, in Switzerland. The best edition that of Rupert, Göttingen, 1798. b. about j.; d. 100.

SILVA, Jean Baptiste, sil'-va, a French physician, who was born of Jewish parents, but renounced his religion, and, after taking his degree at Montpellier, settled at Paris, where he gained a great reputation by his skill, and became physician to Louis XV. He wrote a "Treatise on the Use of Bleeding." b. at Bordeaux, 1682; d. 1748.

SILVA Y FIGUEROA, Garcia de, sil'-va e-fe-gwai'-v-a, a Spanish diplomatist and writer, was at first a page to Philip II., and afterwards distinguished himself in the Spanish army in Flanders. In 1624 he was despatched upon an embassy to Shah Abbas, king of Persia. He wrote an account of his travels, which was never published in the original Spanish; but a French translation of the work was produced in 1667, under the title of "The Embassy of Don Garcia de Silva y Figueroa into Persia." He also wrote an abridged History of Spain, and a short account of his travels, in a letter to the Marquis de Bedmar, which was published at Antwerp in 1620. b. at Badajoz, 1574; d. in Spain, in 1628.

SILVESTER I., Pope, sil'-ves'-ter, was elected in 314. The Arian heresy commenced in his pontificate, and he distinguished himself against the Donatists. d. 336.

SILVESTER II. was at first a monk in Auvergne; but his superior talents exciting the envy and hatred of his companions, he withdrew from the monastery and went to Spain. The Duke of Barcelona took him to Italy, where he was noticed by the emperor Otho, who gave him an abbey, which he afterwards quitted, and, proceeding to Germany, became preceptor to Otho III. He was afterwards tutor to the son of Hugh Capet, by whom he was made archbishop of Rheims. By the interest of Otho, he gained the papacy in 999. He was a man of considerable learning, particularly in the mathematical sciences. d. 1003.

SIMEON METAPHRASES, sim'-e-on met'-a-frä's'-tees, a Greek ecclesiastical historian, who was secretary of state under Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who engaged him to write the "Lives of the Saints," which he performed. This work, a kind of religious romance, has been translated into Latin. Lived in the 10th century.

SIMEON OF DURHAM, an English historian, who taught mathematics at Oxford, and was subsequently precentor in Durham Cathedral. He produced a history of the kings of England from 616 to 1130, the materials for which he collected in the north of England. This work was afterwards continued up to the year 1156, by John, the prior of Hexham. He also wrote a history of Durham Cathedral, under the title of "Historia Ecclesiæ Dunelmensis" which was published in 1732. Supposed to have died after 1130.

SIMEON SETHUS, se'-thus, a Greek author, who was the master of the wardrobe in the palace of Antiochus, at Constantinople. He was subsequently banished to Thrace by Michael the Paphlagonian. He produced a work containing a list of all eatable things, compiled from the Greek, Persian, Arabian, and Indian physicians. He also translated into Greek the fables of Pilpay, and, from the Persian, a history of Alexander the Great, which is, however, nothing else than a romance, but, according to Warton has been translated into Latin, French, German and Italian. Flourished towards the close of the 11th century.

SIMEON STYLITES, sti-ll'-teece, the founder of a sect, was a native of Cilicia, and a shepherd till the age of 13, when he entered a monastery, after which he led a life singularly austere. He partook of food but once a week, placed himself upon a pillar (in Greek stylos), whence he acquired the name of Stylites, and his example was followed by many other devotees, who seated themselves upon pillars of different heights on a mountain in Syria, where they pretended to see different visions. n. 382; p. 460.

SIMON, Rev. Charles, an eminent English divine and theological writer, was educated at Eton, and entered at King's College, Cambridge, in 1776. In 1783 he was presented to the living of Trinity Church in that university, of which he continued to be the rector during the remainder of his life—a period of 53 years. When his works, which are very numerous, were published entire in 1832, they consisted of 21 volumes, containing 2536 sermons and skeletons of sermons, which form a commentary upon every book of the Old and New Testament; besides various tracts and devotional treatises. Mr. Cadell, the bookseller, paid the author 5000*l.* for the copyright, out of which he appropriated 1000*l.* to the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, 1000*l.* to the London Clerical and Education Society, and 1000*l.* to the Church Missionary Society. n. 1733; p. 1836.

SIMMIAS, sim'-mi-äs, a philosopher of Thebes, who was a friend of Socrates, and is one of the speakers in the "Phædon" of Plato. None of his works are extant.

SIMMIAS, a grammarian of Rhodæ, who wrote a work upon languages, and some poems, which are included in the "Anthologia Græca." Flourished about n.c. 300.

SIMMEL, Lambert, sim'-nel, an impostor, who was the son of a baker at Oxford, and was set up as Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, and heir to the English throne. He succeeded in gathering together a considerable number of adherents, who were defeated by Henry VII., at Stoke, in 1487. Simmel was subsequently employed as a turnspit in the royal kitchen.

SIMON, Richard, si'-mun-ion, an erudite French divine. He was a profoundly learned man, but entertained very free opinions, and had many antagonists. His principal works were, the "Ceremonies and Customs of the Jews," "Critical History of the Old Testament," "Critical History of the Text of the New Testament," "Critical History of the Versions of the New Testament, and of the principal Commentaries thereon," a French translation of the New Testament, with literal and critical notes; and "History of the Origin and Progress of Ecclesiastical Revenues." n. 1639; p. 1712.

SIMON, St. (See SAINT-SIMON.)

SIMONIDES, si-mon'-i-der, a Greek philosopher and poet, whose compositions were principally elegiac, and particularly excellent. Fragments of his poems were published by Schneidewin, Brunswick, 1835. n. in the Island of Cœus, about 656 b.c.; p. at Syracuse, 467 b.c.

SIMONIDES OF AXOROS, a Greek poet, who wrote satires upon individuals, fragments of which have been preserved, and also a satire upon women, which is extant. Flourished in the 7th century b.c.

SIMPSON, Thomas, sim'-son, an eminent English mathematician. His parents were too poor to give him an education, and he was, when very young, placed at the loom as a weaver. From a travelling pedlar he gained some knowledge of arithmetic and astrology, to which he soon afterwards added geometry and algebra. He supported himself by exercising the combined occupations of schoolmaster and weaver until 1735, when he repaired to London, and worked for some time in Spitalfields, employing his leisure hours in study, and also in teaching others. So great was his progress, that, in 1737, he published his excellent "Treatise on Fluxions," which brought him into considerable notice. In 1749 appeared his book entitled "A Treatise on the Nature and Laws of Chance," which occasioned a dispute between himself and Democire. In 1743 he was appointed professor of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy of Woolwich. He was also elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Beside the preceding works, he wrote the "Elements of Algebra and Geometry," "Select Exercises in Mathematics," and some "Miscellaneous Tracts," in which important work he solved many of the most difficult problems in astronomy. n. at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, 1710; p. 1761.

S., Sir James, a British general, who entered the army in his 16th year, and took part in the Spanish campaign of 1812. Promoted to the rank of captain in 1813, he was seriously wounded at the battle of Quatre Bras. He subsequently served in the Peninsula, and held the command-in-chief in the 1st division and all the divisions of the army.

He was promoted to the rank of major-general, and distinguished himself in the battles of Mervane and Hyderabad. In 1841 he was appointed to the command at Chittagong. May, 1855, Sir James, who had been for some time major-general, was nominated chief of the staff in the Crimean army, under Lord Raglan, at whose death he succeeded to the command-in-chief; but, after the repulse at the Rodan, he resigned his command to Sir W. Colingridge. He was, however, created G.C.B. and grand cross of the Legion of Honour. n. at Edinburgh, 1792.

SIMPSON, Dr. James Young, an eminent modern physician, who, after practising his profession with considerable success, acquired a high reputation through having employed sulphuric ether, and afterwards chloroform, as an anæsthetic agent. For this triumph of science over physical suffering, he was rewarded with a prize of 2000 francs from the Paris Academy of Sciences, and was elected a member of the learned societies both in England and upon the continent of Europe. His scientific knowledge was both various and profound, as will be perceived by the enumeration of such works as "Antiquarian Notes upon Leprosy," "Ancient Roman Medicine Stamps," "Was the Roman Army provided with Medical Officers?" and "Notes on some Ancient Vases for containing Lykion," &c. He also wrote extensively on purely professional topics. He was professor of midwifery in the university of Edinburgh, and physician-acoucheur in Scotland to her Majesty Queen Victoria. n. at Bathgate, Linlithgowshire, 1811.

SIMROCH, Charles, sim'-rok, an eminent modern German writer, who produced lads, and romances, and fulfilled the functions of professor of German language and literature at the university of Bonn. His principal works were, "The Picturesque and Romantic Rhineland," and "Sources of Shakspeare's Plots, in Novels, Tales, and Legends." b. 1802.

SIMSON, Dr. Robert, sim'-son, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who was sent, in his 14th year, to the university of Glasgow, where he rapidly acquired an extensive knowledge of the learned languages and mathematics. In 1710 he went to London, and there made the acquaintance of Dr. Halley and Mr. Ditton, the mathematical master of Christ's Hospital, from the conversation of both of whom Simson's knowledge of mathematics was greatly enlarged. He obtained the professorship of mathematics in the university of Glasgow in 1711, and retained that office during the subsequent fifty years. His most important works were a corrected edition of Euclid's "Elements of Geometry," which has become the standard text of the ancient geometer; a "Treatise on Conic Sections," and a restoration of Euclid's "Porisms." Dr. Simson was one of the most profound of the British geometers. b. in Ayrshire, 1687; d. 1768.

SIMS REEVES, J., sims reeves, an eminent modern English vocalist, who was the son of a musician, and from an early period gave unmistakable indications of musical genius. In his 14th year he could perform upon several instruments, and his musical knowledge was so extensive, that even at that early age he was appointed organist and director of the choir at the church of North Cray, in Kent. Having discovered that he had a voice of good quality and extensive range, he took lessons from a professor of singing, and in his 19th year made his appearance at Newcastle, in the baritone parts of Rudolpho in the "Sonnambula," and of Dandini in "Cenerentola." After a highly successful career in the provinces, he repaired to Italy for the purpose of perfecting himself in his art. He studied under Mazzucato at Milan and afterwards appeared at La Scala as Edgardo, in "Lucia di Lammermoor," with great success. At the other great Italian theatres, he was also received with the warmest approbation. In 1817 he made his début at Drury-lane Theatre, in the part of Edgardo, and was immediately recognised as the best of English tenors. His reputation increased constantly till he came to be regarded by the general mass of the public as the greatest vocalist of his time. b. at Woolwich, 1821.

SINCLAIR, Sir John, sin'-clair, a learned Scotch author, who was educated for the legal profession, and became a member of the English bar and of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland. He also sat in Parliament and at the board of privy council. In 1791 he formed a society for improving wool, and subsequently contributed to the establishment of the Board of Agriculture in Scotland. He was an industrious writer, and, during fifty years, composed a large number of works; the most important of which were, "A Statistical Account of Scotland;" "History of the Revenue of Great Britain;" and "An Account of the Northern Districts of Scotland." b. at Thurso Castle, Caithness, 1754; d. at Edinburgh, 1835.

SINCLAIR, Catherine, by marriage Lady Long, was the daughter of the preceding, whose biography she wrote. She produced 8 number of novels and miscellaneous works, the most important of which were, "Modern Accomplishments;" "Modern Society;" "The Journey of Life;" "Modern Flirtations;" "Beatrice;" "A Tour in Wales;" "Scotland and the Scotch;" "The First Lieutenant's Story;" and some books for children. b. 1800; d. 1884.

SINDIAH, sin'-di-a, the name of a celebrated family of Mahratta chieftains, the most distinguished of whom were:—

SINDIAH, Ranojee, who was at first bearer of the slippers to the Peishwa Bajerow. Being one day found asleep by his master, with the slippers tightly clasped to his breast, his fidelity was rewarded with a post in the body-guard. From that time he rose rapidly, and obtained the government of half the province of Malwa.

SINDIAH, Madhaje, was son of the preceding, and, from an early age, followed the profession of arms. Profiting by the weakness of the Mogul emperor Shah Alim II., he became the master of Delhi in 1771, and subsequently conquered Agra, Allyghur, and almost the whole of the Doab. He engaged in his service several French officers, the most distinguished of whom, the Count de Boigne, introduced a regular system of discipline into his army. After a series of contests, Sindiah gained possession of a vast tract of territory lying to the south-west of the river Ganges, and as far as the Nerbudda. Sindiah's rule was exceedingly mild and just for an Asiatic prince, and throughout his ambitious career, he displayed the most complete contempt for all the forms of Eastern luxury. b. about 1743; d. at Poonah, 1794.

SINDIAH, Dowlat Row, grand-nephew of the preceding, who appointed him his heir, commenced his reign in his thirteenth year, and, under the influence of his father-in-law, evinced himself a rapacious and sanguinary prince. In 1803 the British declared war against him; the fortress of Ahmednuggur was taken; while, at Assaye, Major-General Wellesley totally defeated his forces and those of his ally, the rajah of Berar. General Lake also routed his army in several encounters; whereupon Sindiah was driven to purchase a peace at the cost of the cession of 50,000 square miles of territory. His army of 40,000 men, trained by De Boigne, was destroyed, and 500 pieces of artillery were taken from him. He never again ventured to make a direct attack upon the British; so that, when the power of the Mahratta chiefs was entirely broken up, in 1818, he was the only one of them allowed to retain territory. b. 1781; d. 1837.

SINGLETON, Henry, sin'-gel-ton, an English historical painter, whose facility of execution and readiness of invention were very great. West said of him, "Propose to Singleton a subject, and it will be on canvas in five or six hours." He was extensively employed by print-publishers, and many of his historical designs were highly popular in their day. He was a regular exhibitor at the Royal Academy for upwards of fifty years, but he never rose to the honours of a Royal Academician. His best works were, "Hannibal swearing Enmity to the Romans;" "The Storming of Seringapatam;" "The Death of Tippoo Saib," and "The Surrender of Tippoo's Sons;" "Coriolanus and his Mother;" and "Christ entering Jerusalem." b. in London, 1766; d. 1839.

SIMON, Jacques, seer'-mawnd, a French Jesuit, who became secretary to Aquaviva, general of his order, at Rome, where he examined the manuscripts in the Vatican. In 1613 he returned to France, and was appointed confessor to Louis XIII., which office he discharged with great reputation. He produced, among other important works, an edition of the Councils of France, editions of the works of Marcellinus, Theodoret, and Hincmar; and a great number of miscellaneous pieces on theological subjects. b. at Riom, France, 1559; d. 1651.

SIRMOND, sir-mô'-i-us, succeeded Damasus I. as bishop of Rome, in 384, under the reign of Valentinian II. He wrote a condemnation of the heresies of the Donatists, Priscillianists, &c., and also composed an epistle relative to the celibacy of the clergy. d. 398.

SIRMOND, John, nephew of the preceding, was a member of the French Academy, and historiographer of France. His works are, "Life of Cardinal d'Amboise," and Latin poems. d. 1619.

SIXTUS, si-sin'-ni-us, became bishop of Rome in succession to John VII., in 707. He retained the dignity only twenty days; his death taking place at the end of that period. He was succeeded by Constantine.

SIMONDI, John Charles Leonard Simonde de, sees-môn'-de, a distinguished historian, who was descended of an ancient Tuscan family, which had settled first in France, and, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, at Geneva. The historian received his education at the college of Geneva; but the Revolution having swept away a considerable portion of his father's property, he was compelled to enter a banking-house at Lyons. In 1793 he went to England, with his family, and, while there, studied the English language and constitution, which knowledge was of essential service to him in after-life. In 1795 he settled in Italy as a farmer, and, in the leisure left from his agricultural pursuits, occupied himself with the composition of his "Researches upon the Constitution of Free Peoples." His first published work was, however, the "Picture of Tuscan Agriculture," which appeared at Geneva in 1801. This was succeeded by a work upon political economy, in which the views of Adam Smith were followed. In 1806 he set out upon a tour through Italy, in company with Madame de Staël, with whom he had become acquainted at Geneva. That journey turned his attention to the history of the land of his ancestors; and, accordingly, in 1807 he published his first historical work, under the title of the "Italian Republics." He also wrote Italian biographies for the "Biographie Universelle" of Michaud. His "Histoire des Français," considered to be his greatest work, was commenced in 1819, and occupied his pen till the close of his life; but in the meanwhile he gave to the world several less important, but, nevertheless, highly valuable works; the chief of which were, "Lectures upon the Literature of the South of Europe" (translated into English by Thomas Roscoe, and published in Bohn's Standard Library); "History of the Fall of the Roman Empire and of the Decline of Civilization;" and "Studies in Social Science." b. at Geneva, 1773; d. 1851.

SIXTUS I., siz'-tus, Pope, was an Alexander I. in the year 119. He died in 127.

SIXTUS II. was the successor of Stephen I. He is stated to have been an Athenian and a philosopher before his conversion to Christianity. He was one of those who suffered martyrdom in the persecution of the Christians by Valerianus, 258.

SIXTUS III. was the successor of Celestine I., in 432. He endeavoured to reconcile the disputes existing in the Eastern Church, particularly in the case of Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, and John of Antioch. Some of the epistles which he composed with regard to these controversies are extant, and are included in the collection of Constant. He was also a munificent patron of learning, and is stated to have left 5000 silver marks to be expended in the embellishment of ecclesiastical structures. d. 440.

SIXTUS IV., Pope, was the son of a fisherman on the coast of Genoa, but became a monk of the order of the Cordeliers. His abilities procured him the chair of divinity at Padua and other universities of Italy. He also became general of his order, and was honoured with the cardinalship by Paul II., whom he succeeded in 1471. He is accused of having been a participator in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, the object of which was to destroy the Medici family. (See Pazzi.) He also endeavoured to raise a new crusade against the infidels, but without success. Sixtus issued a bull granting indulgence to those who celebrated the feast of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin. d. 1484.

SIXTUS V., Pope, was the son of a gardener of Ancona. When very young, he was put to keep swine, from which situation he was taken by a Cordelier, who was pleased with his quickness, and placed him in a convent belonging to that order, in a manual capacity. He made so a progress in learning as to be into letters, and to be and professor of divinity at Siena; upon which he took the habit of Montalto. After obtaining several degrees of distinction, he was made cardinal in 1586. In this capacity he affected uncommon piety and devotion, and counteracted the excesses of sickness and age with so much art as to dupe the whole conclave. After the death of Gregory XIII., the cardinals were divided as to the election; when, considering that Montalto was an infirm old man who could not live long, they united in choosing him to the vacant chair in 1585. The election was no sooner declared, than, to the astonishment of all, he strode into the midst of the chapel, threw away his crutch, and began to sing the Te Deum with a loud voice. He commenced his pontificate by clearing the Ecclesiastical States of the numerous bands of robbers which infested it. He also punished with great severity all kinds of vice, and was inflexible in the administration of justice. He limited the number of cardinals to seventy, raised the famous obelisk which Calligula had caused to be brought from Spain, and reformed many abuses which prevailed in the government. He excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, but is stated to have secretly admired the opposition made by the English sovereign to the ambitious projects of Philip II. of Spain. He embellished Rome with several fine structures, and built the Vatican Library. By his orders a new version of the Bible in Latin was published. d. 1521; d. 1590.

SKELTON, John, skel'-ton, an English poet, was educated at the university of Oxford, and, on entering into orders, obtained the living of Diss, in Norfolk; but his conduct was very irregular.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Slade

Smirke

Wolsey, in his poem entitled "Why come ye not to Court?" he was obliged to take refuge with Islip, abbot of Westminster, where he continued till his death. He wrote satires, sonnets, and an invective against Lily, the grammarian. His poetical works have been published by the Rev. Alexander Dyce. b. either in Cumberland or Norfolk, about 1480; d. at Westminster, 1520.

SLADE, Sir Adolphus K.C.B., slaid, an English officer, in the service of Turkey, where he was called Muchaver Pacha. He entered the English navy at an early age, and commanded a cutter at the battle of Navarino in 1828. After attaining the rank of post-captain, he was permitted to take service under the Ottoman flag, for the purpose of introducing some necessary reforms into the naval forces of the sultan. Captain Slade published two works upon the East of some value, entitled "Records of Travels in Turkey," and "Turkey, Greece, and Malta." b. 1807.

SHERMAN, Sir William Henry, she'-man, a distinguished officer in the service of the East India Company, who served in the Nepaulese war of 1812, and afterwards fulfilled the functions of British resident at Lucknow with admirable tact. His works, entitled "Diary in Oude," and "Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Officer," are said to be the best treatises extant upon the religion and social condition of the kingdom of Oude. He was a zealous advocate for the annexation of that country to the British possessions in India. The suppression of Thuggee was also strenuously recommended by him. b. in Cornwall, 1788; d. at sea, on his return to England, 1856.

SLEIDAN, John, slé'-dan, a German historian, whose original name was Philipson. He was for some time in the family of the Cardinal du Bellay, who allowed him a pension; but, having embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, he quitted Paris and repaired to Strasburg, where he became the historian to the Protestant League. His principal works are, a history, in Latin, of the Reformation in Germany; an abridgment of Froissart's "Chronicles," in Latin; a "Universal History," of which Voltaire made considerable use; and a Latin translation of the "Memoirs of Philip de Commines." b. at Sleida, near Cologne, 1506; d. 1580.

SLOANE, Sir Hans, slone, an eminent Irish physician and naturalist, who studied in London, where he contracted an intimacy with Boyle and Ray, and afterwards went to Paris, and attended the lectures of Tournefort and Du Verney. He returned to London in 1684, and became a favourite with Dr. Sydenham, who took him into his house. The same year he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1687 admitted of the College of Physicians. Shortly afterwards he went to Jamaica with the duke of Albemarle, governor of that island, as his physician; and though he resided there only fifteen months, made a collection of not less than eight hundred different plants. On his return in 1689, he settled in London, and in 1694 was chosen physician to Christ's Hospital. The preceding year he was elected secretary to the Royal Society, upon which he revived the publication of the "Philosophical Transactions." He was also active in promoting the establishment of a dispensary for the poor, and was one of the founders of the Foundling Hospital. In 1707 he published the first volume of his "Natural History of Jamaica;"

but the second did not appear till 1727. In 1708 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and, on the accession of George I., created a baronet. In 1719 he became president of the College of Physicians, having previously been elected to the same distinguished post in the Royal Society, on the death of Newton. His magnificent cabinet of curiosities was purchased by Parliament for £20,000, which did not amount to a fourth part of its actual value. This collection served as the foundation of the British Museum. Several of his papers are in the "Philosophical Transactions." b. at Killleagh, county Down, Ireland, 1660; d. at Chelsea, 1753.

SMART, Christopher, smärt, an English divine and poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Cambridge, where he several times obtained the Seatonian prize for the best poem, became poor and disordered in his mind. He translated the Psalms, Phædrus, and Horace into English verse. His original poems possess merit. b. at Sheppburne, Kent, 1722; d. in the King's Bench, 1770.

SMEATON, John, sme'-ton, an eminent English mechanician and engineer, who was intended for the law by his father, who was an attorney, but, at his own request, was placed under a mathematical instrument maker. Having acquired considerable reputation by his inventions in hydraulics, &c., he, in 1763, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1759 obtained the gold medal for his paper on "The Natural Powers of Wind and Water to turn Mills and other Machines depending on a Circular Motion." The two lighthouses which had been successively erected upon the Eddystone rock having been destroyed, the first by a storm and the second by fire, Smeaton was appointed to rebuild the structure, which he completed in a manner beyond expectation; and it may be justly pronounced a work unparalleled of its kind, for, having been buffeted by the storms of a hundred years, it stands unmoved as the rock upon which it is built. He also made improvements in wind and water-mills, the steam-engine; completed the harbour of Ramsgate, planned the great canal from the Forth to the Clyde, and executed a number of other great works. He published a curious account of the construction of the Eddystone lighthouse, and commenced a treatise on mills, which he did not live to complete. He was also the author of an "Account of the Improvements in Ramsgate Harbour" which were conducted by him. b. at Anthorpe, near Leeds, 1724; d. 1792.

SMIRKE, Robert, smirk, an English artist, who was originally a coach-painter, but became one of the first pictorial delineators of his time. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1792. He made a great number of designs for book-sellers, and was one of the artists engaged to illustrate Baydell's Shakspeare. His best paintings were "The Combat between Don Quixote and the Giants interrupted by the Innkeeper," "The Seven Ages of Man," and "Prince Henry and Falstaff." b. 1752; d. in London, 1845.

SMIRKE, Sir Robert, an eminent English architect, and eldest son of the preceding, after receiving some preliminary instructions in art from his father, went upon a tour in Italy, Greece, and Germany, and upon his return published "Specimens of Continental Architecture," and some smaller treatises. He found some influential patrons, and before he had attained his 30th year was engaged to make the designs for Covent Garden Theatre. This structure was destroyed by fire in 1856. His next great undertakings were the Mint, and the Post-office in St. Martin's-le-Grand, which last building was completed in 1829. The most important of his other works were, the College of Physicians, the Union Club in Trafalgar Square, the extension of King's Bench Walk, Temple, and King's College. Finally, his greatest structure is the British Museum, which was commenced in 1823, but was not completed until the year 1847. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1812, and was created a knight in 1831. b. 1780; d. 1867.

SMIRKE, Sydney, an eminent English architect, and younger brother of the preceding. His first important work was the Oxford and Cambridge University Club in Pall Mall, upon which he was engaged with his brother, the Pall Mall front being understood to be after his own designs. He superintended the restorations made in the Temple Church in 1842, and afterwards, in conjunction with Mr. Basevi, designed the Conservative Club-house in St. James's Street. For the late Sir Robert Peel he erected a new portrait-gallery at Drayton Manor, and in 1817 was engaged as the architect of the new Carlton Club, in designing which he employed the library of St. Mark, by Sansovino, as his model. One of the most important of his later works was the reading-room of the British Museum, erected in the inner quadrangle of that building. In this undertaking, however, he only acted under the suggestions of Mr. Panizzi, the principal librarian of the Museum. This handsome structure is of iron, its dome being (with the exception of the Pantheon of Rome, which has a greater diameter of two feet) the largest in existence. All the internal arrangements of this eminently successful work were also designed by Mr. Panizzi; but to Mr. Smirke's constructive skill is due the merit of a perfect execution of the original conception. b. about 1800.

SMITH, Sir Thomas, smith, an eminent English statesman, who received his education at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow, and appointed Greek lecturer, in which capacity he introduced a new method of pronouncing that language, which became general in the university, though opposed by the chancellor. In 1689 he went abroad, and took his doctor's degree of law at Padua. In 1542 he was made regius professor of that faculty at Cambridge. Through the interest of the duke of Somerset, he was knighted and made secretary of state by Edward VI.; but, in the succeeding reign, he lost his preferments. Queen Elizabeth employed him in several embassies to France, and made him secretary of state and chancellor of the Garter. Sir Thomas wrote a treatise, in Latin, on the "Right Pronunciation of Greek," printed at Paris by Stephens in 1668, and some other works. b. at Saffron-Walden, Essex, about 1616; d. 1677.

SMITH, John, an English navigator, who, between the years 1606-14, made three voyages to Virginia, and assisted to found James town. Having fallen into the hands of the Indians, he was about to be tortured and put to death, when Pocahontas, the beautiful daughter of the chief interposed, and, at the peril of her own life, saved that of the English adventurer. He wrote a work, entitled "A Description of New England; or, Observations and Discoveries of Captain John Smith." Like Sir Walter Raleigh, he was one of the chief founders of the Anglo-American colonies. b. 1579; d. 1631.

SMITH, John, a learned English physician, who became fellow of the College of Physicians in London. He wrote a curious book, entitled "The Portrait of Old Age; or, a Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes XII." d. 1679.

SMITH, Thomas, a learned English divine, who became fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1668 went to Constantinople as chaplain to the English embassy. He wrote, among other works, "Four Epistles on the SMITH, Dr. Robert, an eminent English mathematician, who early in life became tutor to the duke of Cumberland, and subsequently professor of astronomy in the university of Cambridge, and master of Trinity College. His principal works were, "A Complete System of Optics," an improved edition of Cotes's "Lectures on Hydrostatics and Pneumatics;" and "Harmonics, or, the Philosophy of Musical Sound." He bequeathed two annual prizes of £25 to be awarded to bachelors of arts who had shown the greatest advancement in mathematics and natural philosophy. These bachelors are called "Smith's prizemen." b. 1689; d. at Cambridge, 1768.

SMITH, Adam, an eminent Scotch writer on political economy, received his education first at Kirkcaldy grammar-school, and subsequently at the universities of Glasgow and Oxford. After being engaged during three years in reading lectures upon rhetoric and belles-lettres at Edinburgh, he was nominated professor of logic and moral philosophy at the university of Glasgow. In 1759, by the publication of his "Theory of Moral Sentiments," he acquired reputation, which was greatly heightened and extended by his profound work, entitled "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," which first appeared in 1760. Some years subsequently to the publication of this work, he was, through the influence of the duke of Buccleuch, appointed a commissioner of the customs in Scotland. He was the intimate friend of Hume, and published an Apology for his life, which was severely advertised on by Dr. Horne for its atheistical sentiments. An account of his life and writings was written by Dugald Stewart, and appended to an edition of the "Wealth of Nations." b. at Kirkcaldy, Scotland, 1723; d. 1790.

SMITH, Charlotte, a novelist and poet, whose maiden name was Turner, was at the age of sixteen married to a West India merchant, who afterwards being ruined, she devoted her talents to the support of her husband and family. Her first production was entitled "Elegiac Sonnets and other Essays." After this, she produced "The Romance of Real Life;" the novels of "Emmeline," "Marchmont," "Desmond," "Ethelinda," "Celestine," and "The Old Manor House;" besides several poems, and tales for youth. b. 1749; d. 1806.

SMITH, Rev. Dr. John, an eminent antiquary and Celtic scholar, was educated at the university of St. Andrews; and, in 1774, was appointed assistant and successor in the parish of Kilbrandon, Lorn. About this time he translated into Gaelic the "Catechisms of Dr. Campbellton. In 1781 he became minister of this parish, he published an "Essay on Gaelic Antiquities, containing the History of the Druids, particularly those of Caledonia," "A Dissertation on the Authenticity of the Poems of Ossian," and a "Collection of Ancient Poems, translated from the Gaelic." In 1783 he published a work on the last judgment, editions of which have been published in England and America, and was associated with the Rev. Dr. Stewart, minister of Luss, in translating the Scriptures into Gaelic. While engaged in translating the Scriptures, Dr. Smith, in studying the original, was led to write a concise commentary on the whole of the Bible. In 1787 he published the portion of it which embraced the prophets, and several editions of it were printed, both in England and America. In 1787 he published the "Life of St. Columba, the Apostle of the Highlands," extracted from the Latin of St. Adamnan, &c. About the same time he issued a new and improved edition of the Psalms in Gaelic, also a translation of the paraphrases used in the English psalm books. He also published a "Dissertation on the Nature and Duties of the Sacred Office." Besides his labours for the spiritual improvement of the people committed to his care, he was anxious to introduce among them an improved system of husbandry, and with this view wrote many essays on the subject, and frequently obtained prizes from the Highland Society. He likewise wrote a "Survey of the County of Argyle." b. 1747; d. 1807.

SMITH, John Raphael, an eminent English nezzotint engraver and artist, who reproduced many of the finest portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds. He also painted portraits himself with some skill. b. 1752; d. 1812.

SMITH, Sir James Edward, an eminent English botanist, who was intended for a mercantile calling; but having, from an early period, evinced a decided predilection for scientific pursuits, his father was at length induced to send him to Edinburgh, with a view of qualifying him for the medical profession. Learning from Sir Joseph Banks, that the books, manuscripts, and natural history collections of Linnaeus had been offered to him for £1000, and that he had declined the purchase, Mr. Smith, with some difficulty, succeeded in inducing his father to become the purchaser. This magnificent collection was, after the death of Sir James Smith, who had founded the Linnaean Society, presented to that body. After taking his medical degree at Leyden, he travelled in Italy, Switzerland, and France, and, in 1792, was appointed teacher of botany to Queen Charlotte. In 1814, upon the occasion of his presenting the volumes of the "Transactions" of the Linnaean Society to the Prince-regent, he received the honour of knighthood. He wrote extensively upon his favourite science; his most important works being "English Botany," in 36 volumes; the "English Flora," and the botanical articles in "Rees's Cyclopedia." b. at Norwich, 1759; d. 1828.

SMITH, John Thomas, an eminent English antiquary, who studied drawing under the sculptor Nollekens and at the Royal Academy; after which he became a pupil of Sherwin, the engraver. In 1791 he commenced his fine work next publication of importance, "Antiquities of Westminster." The "Ancient Topography of London" followed. In 1816 he received the appointment of keeper of the prints in the British Museum, an office he retained until his death. Besides the preceding works, he produced "Vagabondiana, or Anecdotes of Mendicant Wanderers through the Streets of London," and "Nollekens and his Times." b. in London, 1766; d. 1833.

SMITH, John Stafford, an eminent English composer, who, in 1802, became organist of the Chapel Royal, in succession to Dr. Arnold. His most admired compositions were the glees,—"Let happy lovers fly where pleasures call;" "Blest pair of Sirens;" "As on a summer's day;" and the madrigal, "Flora now calleth forth each flower." He also produced two musical works, entitled "Musica Antiqua," a collection of anthems; and "Ancient Songs of the Fifteenth Century." b. at Gloucester, about 1750; d. 1830.

SMITH, James, an English littérateur, who was educated for the legal profession, and became solicitor to the Ordnance. After contributing a number of minor pieces to the magazines, he, in 1812 published, in conjunction with his brother Horace, a volume entitled "The Rejected Addresses," which instantly became highly popular. He subsequently wrote several entertainments for the elder Charles Mathews. b. in London, 1775; d. 1839.

SMITH, Horace, brother of the preceding, with whom he wrote "The Rejected Addresses," was also the author of about twenty novels, the best known of which are "The Moneyed Man" and "Brambletye House." Like his brother, he also produced a number of light pieces of a humorous character, in prose and verse. b. in London, 1779; d. 1849.

SMITH, William, an eminent geologist, and entitled "the father of English geology," produced the first geological map of England and Wales, and two works on "Organized Fossils." In consequence of his distinguished services, he obtained a pension of £100 from the crown, received the degree of LL.D. from Trinity College, Dublin, and the Wollaston medal of the Geological Society of London. This last mark of distinction was awarded him "in consideration of his being a great original discoverer in English geology; and especially for his being the first in this country to discover and to teach the identification of strata, and to determine their succession by means of their imbedded fossils." b. at Churchill, Oxfordshire, 1769; d. at Northampton, 1839.

SMITH, Sir William Sidney, a distinguished English admiral, who was, in 1793, sent by Admiral Hood to destroy the French vessels of war in the harbour of Toulon, by means of fireships; but being taken prisoner, he was confined during two years in the Temple at Paris. Having effected his escape, he was sent to act against the French in Egypt, and, by his bravery and skill, compelled Bonaparte to abandon the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, in 1799. In 1805 he was made a rear-admiral, and was afterwards appointed to defend Sicily from the invasion of the French, who were then masters of Naples. In 1807 he accompanied the king of Portugal to Brazil. Not being again employed upon active service, he devoted himself to the propagation of several philanthropic works. He also assisted to found a society, the object of which was to effect the suppression of piracy in the Mediterranean. B. in London, 1764; p. 1840.

SMITH, Joseph, the founder of the religious body commonly called the Mormonites. From an autobiographical account left by himself, as well as from a sketch of his life purporting to be written by his mother, it would appear that he was the son of a farmer of Sharon, Windsor county, Vermont. According to his own statement, he, when about 14 years of age, began to reflect upon the importance of being prepared for a future state, and therefore retired to "a secret place in a grove, and began to call upon the Lord After having received many visits from the angels of God, unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days, on the morning of the 22nd day of September, 1827, the angel of the Lord delivered the records into my hands." These records were stated to be engraved "in Egyptian characters," on plates which had the appearance of gold, and with them Joseph Smith further stated, though in the vaguest way, that he found "a curious instrument, which the ancients called Urim and Thummim, which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rim, on a bow fastened to a breastplate." Through the medium of this instrument, he professed to be able to translate the records, which were said to have been written by Mormon, a Jewish prophet, and to contain a history of ancient America, from its first settlement by a colony that came from the Tower of Babel, at the confusion of languages, to the beginning of the 5th century of the Christian era. His own account of what was contained in the records was, "that America, in ancient times, was inhabited by two distinct races of people. The first were called Jaredites, and came directly from the Tower of Babel; the second race came directly from the city of Jerusalem, about 600 years before Christ. They were principally Israelites, of the descendants of Joseph. The Jaredites were destroyed about the time that the Israelites came from Jerusalem, who succeeded them in the inheritance of the country. The principal nation of the second race fell in battle towards the close of the 4th century. This book also tells us that our Saviour made his appearance upon this continent after his resurrection; that they had apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, and evangelists,—the same order, the same priesthood, the same ordinances, gifts, powers, and blessing, as were enjoyed on the eastern continent; that the people were cut off in consequence of their transgressions; that the last of the prophets who existed among them was commanded to write an abridgment of their prophecies, history, &c., and to hide it up in the earth, and that it should come forth and be united with the Bible." Joseph Smith first made known his discovery of the engraved plates to the members of his own and his father's household. These became his first converts. When the news spread, the prophet says, "My house was frequently beset by mobs and evil-designing persons; several times I was shot at, and very narrowly escaped; and every device was made use of to get the plates away from me." He succeeded, however, in gathering together a number of believers. In 1830 he published the "Book of Mormon," which had been translated from the plates through the aid of the curious spectacles called the "Urim and Thummim." In carrying out that work, Joseph Smith always retired behind a screen, whence he dictated the record to "a scribe," named Oliver Cowdrey, who, like himself, had been baptized by an angel, to fit him for the task. After the translation had been completed, the plates were shown to eight witnesses, and "the angel again made his appearance to Joseph; at which time Joseph delivered up the plates into the angel's hands, and he (the angel) has them in his charge to this day." The foregoing is a brief account of the discovery and translation of the "Book of Mormon" according to the prophet's own statement; but there is another story told of the authorship; viz., that the volume was founded upon a religious romance, entitled "The Manuscript Found," written by one Solomon Spalding, a Presbyterian teacher. The manuscript of this work is said to have been taken to New York by the preacher's widow ten years after his death, with the view of finding a publisher for it: but by some means it came into the possession of Smith, or an associate of his, named Ugdon. In 1830 the first Mormon church, or, as the founder called it, that of the "Latter-day Saints," was established in the town of Manchester, Ontario county, state of New York. From that time the sect increased with astonishing rapidity, and churches were set up in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Missouri, and New York. Despite ridicule, persecution, and tarring and feathering, the work went on, until, in 1838, the Mormonites were expelled from Missouri. They settled in Illinois, and in "the fall of 1839" founded the city of Nauvoo (the beautiful), on the banks of the Mississippi. Soon, from a wild tract, the spot became a city of 1500 well-built houses, with more than 15,000 inhabitants. This settlement received large accessions to its numbers, not alone in the shape of converts, who flocked in from foreign countries as well as from other states of America, but also from "gentile" adventurers, who were attracted to the place by its fertility of soil. And although Joseph Smith, as "seer, prophet, and revelator" of his own city, possessed commanding influence in Nauvoo, he was being constantly embroiled with the civil authorities of the state of Illinois. In 1844 the governor of that state issued a warrant against Joseph Smith, as the instigator of a riot, during which the printing-offices and premises of a "gentile" newspaper were destroyed by the Mormons. The prophet at first made symptoms of resistance, and called out his militia, of which he was lieutenant-colonel; but subsequently offered to surrender if the governor would provide a guard for his society until his trial should take place. He was lodged in Carthage gaol under a small guard, selected, it is assumed, from Smith's enemies. A few days afterwards, a mob of turbulent ruffians broke into his prison, fired into the room where he was confined, and killed his brother Hiram, who was incarcerated with him. The prophet endeavoured to effect his escape by the window, but was taken and shot. His body was interred by his followers with the greatest solemnity, and he became the martyr of his sect, which, in consequence of its founder's fate, increased even more rapidly than before. Brigham Young was elected to succeed the prophet, and under their new leader the Mormons prepared to emigrate far beyond the American settlements, in order to await the realization of their founder's vision. (See YORKE, Brigham.) Joseph Smith was b. at Sharon, Windsor county, Vermont, 1805; shot in the state of Illinois, 1844.

SMITH, Rev. Sydney, an eminent English divine and essayist, who received his education at Winchester school and New College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow in 1794. During a tour subsequently in Normandy, he acquired the French language, and, after officiating as curate at Nether-Avon, in Wiltshire, for about two years, became tutor to the son of Mr. Hicks Beach, member of Parliament for Cirencester. He next took up his residence at Edinburgh, where he remained about five years, becoming acquainted in that interval with Henry, afterwards Lord Brougham, Francis Jeffrey, afterwards Lord Jeffrey, and other gentlemen who subsequently acquired fame in science and literature. At one of the meetings of these brilliant young men, it was suggested that the "Edinburgh Review" should be started. "One day," says Sydney Smith himself, "we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story, or flat, in Buccleuch-place, the elevated residence of the then Mr. Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a review; this was acceded to with acclamation. I was appointed editor, and remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number of the 'Edinburgh Review.'" The review made its first appearance in October, 1802. He took up his residence in London in 1804, having some time previously married the daughter of Mr. Pybus, a banker. For two years he remained without any preferment in the Church, although he had become famous as a wit, as a popular preacher at the chapel of the Foundling Hospital, as a lecturer on belles-lettres at the Royal Institution, and as a constant contributor to the "Edinburgh Review." Lord Erskine was one of his earliest patrons, and presented him to the rectory of Foston-le-Clay, in Yorkshire, in 1806. This living was exchanged for that of Combe-Florey, in Somersetshire, in 1830. He was also appointed to a stall in Bristol Cathedral, and became one of the canons residentiary of St. Paul's Cathedral. His residence was, however, almost entirely fixed in London, where his brilliant wit and unrivalled conversational powers made him a welcome guest in the most distinguished circles. His contributions to literature, which are characterized by liberal views, clearness, and force of style, and wit and humour in abundance, prin-articles from the "Edinburgh Review," and "Sketches of Moral Philosophy." b. at Woodford, Essex, 1771; d. in London, 1845.

SMITH, Dr. John Pye, an eminent modern theologian and geologist, who became classical tutor in the Theological Academy at Homer-ton, belonging to the Independent denomination. His works are highly esteemed by theologians; the most important of them being, "The Scripture Testimony to the Messiah," "The Mosaic Account of the Creation and the Deluge illustrated by the Discoveries of Modern Science," and "On the Relation between the Holy Scriptures and some parts of Geological Science." Dr. Smith was a fellow of the Royal and Geological Societies, and LL.D. of Marischal College, Aberdeen. b. at Sheffield, 1774; d. 1851.

SMITH, Albert, a modern English littérateur, who was intended for the medical profession, and became a member of the College of Surgeons in 1833. After a residence of some months in Paris, and a visit to Chamouni, he returned to England and joined his father as medical practitioner; but soon quitted this employment for literature. As a magazine-writer and novelist, he achieved a decided success; his most popular productions being, "The Adventures of Mr. Ledbury," "The Scattered Family," "The Marchioness of Brinvilliers," "Christopher Tadpole," and "The Pottleton Legacy." In 1849 he visited Constantinople, and wrote an account of his tour. In the following year he brought out an entertainment called "The Overland Mail" in which he gave an amusing account of that route. In 1852 he commenced, at the Egyptian Hall, his successful entertainment of the "Ascent of Mont Blanc," for several years one of the most popular pieces of amusement in London. That he was possessed of a genuine vein of humour was evinced in the works already quoted, as well as in a very large number of smaller productions, such as "Evening Parties," "The Gout," "The Flirt," some excellent burlesques, &c. b. at Chertsey, 1816; d. at Fulham, 1860.

SMITH, Thomas Southwood, a modern English physician and writer upon medicine, obtained his degree of M.D. at the university of Edinburgh in 1816, after which he settled in the metropolis as a physician. From an early period he devoted himself to the literature of his profession, and produced a "Treatise on Fever," the greater portion of the articles on "Anatomy, physiology, and medicine, for the Penny Cyclopædia," and a valuable little work, entitled "The Philosophy of Health." He was also one of the founders of the "Westminster Review," wherein he denounced that revolting mode of providing the schools of anatomy with the means of dissection, which was called the "resurrection" system. He acted as one of the commissioners of inquiry into the condition of factory-children, the result of whose labours was the passing of the Factory Act. Subsequently, his devotion to the cause of sanitary reform caused him to abandon his practice; and to his reports and disinterested labours was in great part due the passing of the Public Health Act. For these services he received a pension of £300 per annum. In addition to the works already mentioned, he wrote one entitled "Animal Physiology." b. 1788; d. 1861.

SMITH, Sir Henry George Wakelyn, an eminent English general, who entered the army in 1805, and after seeing a great deal of service in South America and at the capture of Copenhagen, was sent to Spain with the expedition of Sir John Moore, under whom he served until the embarkation at Corunna. He returned to Spain in 1807, and having risen to the command of a brigade of the light division, fought at the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, Orthes, and Toulouse, and at the sieges of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz. After serving in America, he returned to Europe in time to participate in the victory at Waterloo. His next employments were upon the staff in various parts of the world, till in 1840 he became adjutant-general of the forces in India. He took part in the victories at Gwalior, and Maharajpore, and later at Moodkee, Ferozepore, Aliwal, and Sohraon. For his services he was created a baronet and G.C.B., received the thanks of Parliament, and was appointed to the colonelcy of the rifle brigade. As governor of the Cape of Good Hope, to which post he was appointed in 1847, he conducted the Caffre war, which he brought to a successful termination in 1853. Two years later, he was raised to the rank of Lieutenant-general. n. in the Isle of Ely, 1788; p. 1880.

SMITH, Dr. William, a modern English philologist, and the editor of several valuable classical dictionaries. He was designed for the law; but although, after completing his education at the university of London, he kept his terms at Gray's Inn, his strong preference for Greek, Latin, and German languages in the Independent colleges at Homerton and Highbury. An article on "Language," furnished by him to the "Penny Cyclopædia," was one of his first successes in that career which he subsequently worthily pursued. In 1842 he commenced the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," fulfilling the duties of editor himself. In the same capacity he subsequently published "The Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology," and the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography." When, in 1850, the colleges of Highbury and Homerton were united, under the designation of the New College, he was appointed professor of the Greek and Latin languages and literature there. Three years later he became classical examiner in the University of London. In 1854 he commenced the publication of a new edition of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," with notes by M. Guizot, Dean Milman, and himself. He also produced several abridged editions of his larger classical dictionaries, a "Latin-English Dictionary," based upon Forcellini and Freund; and a "Dictionary of the Bible." p. in London, 1814.

SMITH, Alexander, a modern Scotch poet, who was intended for the ministry; but circumstances having conspired to prevent his entering upon the necessary course of study, he was put to the business of a lace-designer, in Glasgow; while following which, he devoted his leisure to the composition of verses. Having forwarded some extracts from his "Life Drama" to the Rev. George Gilfillan, of Dundee, that gentleman was so highly pleased with the youthful poet's effusions, as to obtain a place for them in the columns of the "Critic." He subsequently produced "City Poems," and "Edwin of Deira," and three volumes of prose entitled "Dreamthorp," "A Summer in Skye," and "Alfred Hagart's Household." He also edited an edition of the works of Burns. In 1854 he was appointed secretary to the Edinburgh University. p. at Kilmarnock, Ayrshire, 1830; p. 1867.

SMOLLETT, Tobias, smoll'-let, an eminent English novelist, who was educated as a surgeon, and served on board a ship of the line at the bombardment of Carthage. He afterwards quitted the service, and took his degree of doctor of physic; but not meeting with encouragement as a medical practitioner, he became a writer by profession. His first work of any pretensions was the novel of "Roderick Random," published in 1748, which soon ran through several editions, but previous to this he had produced two satires, "Advice" and "Reproof." His next novel was "Percy Pickle," in which were inserted Lady Vane's Memoirs; for giving place to which he received "a handsome reward." In 1754 he published the "Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom." He next established the "Critical Review," which was chiefly conducted by him till 1763. For an article in this journal he was prosecuted by Admiral Knowles; on which he was confined in the King's Bench some time, and wrote there the "Adventures of Sir Lancelot Greaves," a feeble imitation of "Don Quixote." In 1757 he published the "History of England," which was afterwards printed in weekly numbers, attaining, in both forms, a large circulation. This work, though inaccurate and partial, brought him both profit and reputation. In 1763 he began a periodical paper, called "The Briton," in defence of Lord Bute's administration, which print was replied to by Wilkes, in the "North Briton." The year following Smollett went abroad, and in 1766 published an account of his travels. In 1771 appeared his novel of "Humphrey Clinker," which possesses great merit, though it is not equal to his former novels. He also wrote some poems, compiled a collection of voyages and travels, and translated "Gli Blas" and "Don Quixote" into English. Hazlitt, in his "Comic Writers," declares that his novels show a great knowledge of life, but less of character. Unlike Fielding, he could not probe beneath the surface; his humour, although genuine and hearty, is coarse and vulgar; he was superficial where Fielding showed deep insight; but he had a rude conception of generosity in some of his characters, of which Fielding seems incapable, his amiable persons being merely good-natured. "It is owing to this that Strap is superior to Partridge; and there is a heartiness and warmth of feeling in some of the scenes between Lieutenant Bowling and his nephew, which is beyond Fielding's power of impassioned writing." p. in Scotland, 1721; p. near Leghorn, 1771.

SMYTH, William, smith, a modern English historian, who received his education at the university of Cambridge, after which he became tutor to Thomas, son of R. B. Sheridan. He accompanied his pupil to Cambridge, where he himself finally settled. In 1809 he was appointed to the chair of modern history. His lectures upon history, commencing with the period at which the northern nations overran the Empire, and ending with the close of the French Revolution, were published in 1840. He was likewise the author of "Evidence of Christianity," and some less important works. p. at Liverpool, 1766; p. at Norwich, 1849.

SNELL, Rodolph, snel, a Dutch philosopher, who was professor of Hebrew and mathematics at Leyden. He wrote some valuable works on philosophy and mathematics, p. 1547; p. at Leyden, 1813.

SNELL, Willebrord, a Dutch mathematician, and son of the preceding, whom he succeeded in the mathematical chair at Leyden. According to Huygens and Vossius, he discovered the true law of the refraction of the rays of light, which has been attributed to Descartes. He wrote a book on the money of the ancients, and several mathematical works. p. at Leyden, 1591; p. 1626.

George III. by Herschel. He subsequently became president of the university of Wilna. b. at Znin, 1756; d. 1830.

SNIDER, Jacob, sni'-der, an American, who invented the rifle which bears his name, and process for converting Enfield rifles into breech-loaders, for which the British government were backward in giving him a suitable remuneration.

SNORRO, Sturleson, sno'-ro, an Icelandic historian, who, as a lawyer, linguist, mathematician, architect, and antiquary, was one of the best learned men of his time. He was the last braised the principles of the Reformation, he deemed it expedient to quit Italy in 1517. After passing through several countries, he settled at Zurich, where he was suspected of Arianism, and having put some "pertinent questions" to Calvin, that theologian declined them, assuring him that if he did not "timely correct this itch of inquiry, he would draw on himself great torments." Socinus profited by the hint, but more by the fate of Servetus (see SERVETUS), and retired to Poland, whence he went to Venice, and afterwards returned to . The opinions held by the

and the mysteries of religion, at the courts of Iceland, Norway, Denmark, and Sweden. His most important work was entitled the "Heimskringla," a collection of sagadic songs, partly original, and partly the effusions of other bards relative to the chronicles of the kingdom of Norway. He also produced the "Snorra-Edda," upon the Scandinavian mythology, and the exploits of heroes contemporary with himself. b. 1178; killed in a revolt, 1241.

SNYDERS, Francis, sni'-ders, an eminent Dutch painter and engraver, who excelled in hunting-scenes; the animals and landscapes of which are very fine. The human figures were frequently painted by Rubens. He also excelucidate; and that the doctrines of original sin, atonement, and divine grace, have no foundation in Scripture. A catechism of Socinianism was written by Smalcius and Muskorzewski, and translated into English by the Rev. Th. Reeves, in 1810. Socinus was b. at Siena, 1535; d. at Zurich, 1602.

SOCRATES, so'-k'-ra-tees, nephew of the above, and the propagator and systematizer of his doctrines, inherited his uncle's property, papers, and principles, but did not openly avow the latter for several years. Meantime he was entertained at the court of the duke of Tuscany; but in 1574 went to Germany, whence he removed to Poland, where the Unitarians were established in great numbers. He was at first refused ad-who was the son of a bricklayer, and was taken into the service of Dance, the architect, as errand-boy; but his liberal master perceiving some talent in the lad, allowed him to study in his office as a pupil. He subsequently made such progress as to obtain the gold medal of the Royal Academy for the design of a triumphal arch; and, on the recommendation of Sir William Chambers, he was sent to Italy as travelling student. He remained in the land of classic art between the years 1777-80, and while there became acquainted with Lord Camelford, through whom he subsequently obtained the lucrative appointment of architect to the Bank of England. His earliest practice chiefly consisted in designing country mansions; but, after the Bank appointment, other valuable posts were given to him. In 1791 he became clerk of the works to St. James's Palace; in 1795, architect to the Woods and Forests; and subsequently professor of architecture to the Royal Academy, and surveyor to Chelsea Hospital. He received the order of knighthood in 1831. A large private practice, combined with these lucrative appointments and the fortune he received with his wife, the daughter of a rich city builder, made him a wealthy man. He quarrelled with his son, and refused to be reconciled to him even at the last. The greater part of his wealth was spent upon his house, museum, and library in Lincoln's Inn Fields, which building was, after his death, vested in trustees for the use of the public, who, under certain regulations, are admitted to it without charge. He had no pretensions to be called a great architect. b. at Beading, 1753; d. in London, 1837.

in the end he converted them to his own views so completely, that instead of Unitarians, they came to be termed Socinians. Socinus published several books, which are in the "Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum." b. at Sienna, 1539; d. near Cracow, 1604.

SOCRATES, so'-k'-ra-tees, a celebrated philosopher of Athens, was the son of a sculptor, in which art he himself attained some proficiency. Crito, observing his genius, and admiring his discourses, called him from this employment to the study of philosophy. He also served his country as a soldier, according to his duty as a good citizen, and distinguished himself in several actions, in which he saved the lives of Xenophon and Alcibiades, with whom he contracted a close friendship. On his return to Athens, he presented a remarkable contrast to his contemporaries in the plainness of his dress and the frugality of his living. In his philosophical lectures he endeavoured to effect a general reformation by recommending virtue. He was followed by a number of illustrious disciples, whom he instructed sometimes in the groves of Academus, and at others in the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilissus. The independence of his mind, and the powerful eloquence of his discourses, excited against him many enemies, particularly Melitus and Anytus, at whose instigation Aristophanes ridiculed him in his comedy called the "Clouds." Socrates was next accused before the Council of Five Hundred, of corrupting the Athenian youth, of introducing innovations in religion, and of ridiculing the gods. Upon these charges he was condemned to death by poison. The celebration of the festival of the Theora stayed his execution for a month, which time he employed in iscoursing with his friends on sublime subje s.

He was urged to make his escape, which he might easily have done, as the gaoler's persi-sion had been obtained; but he nobly refu l.
observing, "Where am I to go to avoid death?"
When the term of the festival was ended, e drank off the poison with perfect composi e, after making a libation to the gods, and in a w moments expired. Thus perished Socrate s, whom the oracle had pronounced the wisest man in Greece. The Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and his enemies were univ-sally hated, and died miserably. The life of sayings of Socrates have been transmitted to us by his two most eminent disciples, Xenopho n and Plato. By his wife Xantippe, rendered po-verbial by the violence of her temper, he had several children. Schlegelmacher, in his "Essay on the Worth of Socrates as a Philosopher," observes, "If he went about in the service the god to justify the celebrated oracle (the Delphic response, 'Know thyself'), it is impossible that the utmost point he reached could have been simply to know that he knew nothing; there was a step beyond this which he must have taken,—that of knowing what knowledge is." B. at Athens, 469 B.C.; d. 399 B.C.

SOCRATES, surnamed the Scholastic, wrote an ecclesiastical history from the period where Eusebius ends,—that is, from the year 36 to 439. Being a layman, and not intimat-y acquainted with the subjects he treated, his work is frequently inaccurate. It was published with Eusebius, &c., at Cambridge. B. at Co-stantinople, and flourished in the 6th century.

SCUR, Hubert le, sur, an eminent French sculptor, who settled in England about 16
He modelled and cast the statue of Charles I Charing Cross. The pedestal is from the design of Grinling Gibbons. The statue was not erected when the civil war burst forth; and the Par-ment disposed of it to one John Rivet, a bravo who lived at the "dial near Holborn Conduit."
The brazer was ordered to break up the statue, but he, instead, concealed it by burying it in ground, and, in 1674, after the Restoration, was placed on its present site at the expense of the crown. A story used to be told about the artist's discovering that he had omitted the saddle-girth in his work, after the statue had been set up, and that thereupon he destroyed himself. But, unfortunately for this legend, it is shown that the sculptor died before the statue was erected; and, moreover, the saddle-girth is there. Le Scur modelled many other works, which have been destroyed or lost. B.
England, about 1670.

SOLANDER, Daniel Charles, so-lan'-der, eminent Swedish naturalist, and the pupil of Linnaeus, took his degree as doctor of medicine at Upsal, and in 1760 visited England.
At the request of Sir Joseph Banks, he accompanied him in the voyage round the world with Captain Cook. In 1773 he was appointed university librarian of the British Museum. He wrote
"Description of the Collection of Petrifications found in Hampshire," and given to the British Museum; "Observations on Natural History" Cook's Voyage," and left a mass of valuable manuscripts, which are contained in the British Museum. B. at Nordland, Sweden, 1736; d. 1783.

SOLANO, F. M., so-la'-no, Marquis of Socarré, a Spanish nobleman, who, in 1798, entered the army of the French republic as a volunteer. He subsequently became captain-general of Andalusia and governor of Madrid; but was, in 1803, killed by the people of the latter city for alleged sympathy with the French invaders. This was the first act of resistance offered by the Spaniards to Napoleon.

SOLARIO, Antonio de, so-la'-ro-o, an eminent Italian painter, who was by birth a gipsy, whence he was termed il Zingaro. He was taken into the house of Colantonio del Fiore, a Neapolitan artist, as a maker of iron implements.
The daughter of Colantonio and Solario fell in love with each other; but the father declared that his child should marry no one whose reputation as a painter was not as great as his own.
Solario thereupon proceeded to study the art, and, in nine years, made such progress that he gained Colantonio's consent to the marriage.
This story closely resembles that told of Quentin Matsys. Solario also excelled as an illuminator of MSS. and Bibles. B. in the Abruzzi, about 1382; d. 1455.

SOLIGNAC, Peter Joseph, Chevalier de, so-leen-yak, a French historian, who became secretary to Stanislaus, king of Poland, and wrote a history of that country. His other works are, an "Eloge upon Stanislaus;" the "Amours of Horace;" and a treatise on education. B. at Montpellier, 1687; d. 1773.

SOLIMAN, Ebn Abd-al-Malek, sol-i-man', the seventh caliph of the Ommyyades race, who commenced his reign in 715. He conquered the territory upon the south coast of the Caspian, and dispatched his brother Moslemah to besiege Constantinople with a powerful fleet and army;
but the fleet was destroyed by the Greek fire.
He was about to proceed to reinforce Moslemah when he died in Syria, 717.

SOLIMAN, Ebn Cutulmish, the founder of the first Turkish dynasty in Asia Minor, was a Seljukian prince, and was, in 1074, provided with an army for the conquest of the West, by Malek Shah, sultan of Persia. He subjugated almost the whole of Asia Minor, and planted his capital at Nicæa, less than a hundred miles from Constantinople. In 1084 he obtained possession of Antioch by stratagem; but, refusing to pay tribute for the city, as its former masters, the Greeks, had done, he was involved in a war with its suzerain, Moslem-ebn-Koreish, prince of Aleppo, and is supposed to have been either killed in battle or to have perished by his own hand after a defeat, in 1086.

who became king of Cordova, in 1008. After undergoing various changes of fortune, he lost his kingdom and life in 1016. The discovery of the Azores is stated to have been made during his reign.

SOLIMAN, Tcheliabi, the Noble, the son of Bajazet I., after whose defeat at Angora, by Timur, in 1402, made his escape to Europe, and established himself at Adrianople, where he reigned during several years. In 1406 he attempted to subdue the Asiatic provinces, but was recalled to Adrianople by an insurrection excited against his rule by his brother Mousa, who was defeated. The latter again marched against Soliman in 1410, and defeated and slew him, near Adrianople. Mousa was himself dethroned in 1413, by Mahomet I. Soliman was a patron of literature, and one of the bravest and most generous princes of the line of Othman.

SOLIMAN I. (tenth Ottoman sultan), surnamed the Magnificent, succeeded his father, Selim I.,

in 1520. Having concluded a truce with Ismael, sophi of Persia, and quelled a rebellion in Syria, he turned his arms against Europe. In 1521 he took Belgrade, and in the following year Rhodes fell into his hands, after an obstinate defence. In 1529 he made himself master of Buda, and then laid siege to Vienna, whence he was obliged to retreat, with the loss of 120,000 men. In 1534 he marched into the East, and took Tauris from the Persians, but was soon afterwards defeated by the Shah. His forces were also repulsed before Malta; but he took the isle of Chios in 1566. He was a poet, legislator, and warrior of eminent greatness for an Oriental. He encouraged arts and literature, made roads, bridges, erected noble mosques and public buildings, and superintended the compilation of an administrative code. b. 1493; d. at Szigeth, Hungary, 1566.

SOLIMAN II. became sultan upon the deposition of his brother, Mahomet IV., in 1687. His life had been spent, up to his 46th year, in the seraglio, where he had devoted himself to the study of the Koran. Under his weak rule, the Turks were defeated in Hungary and in Servia. d. at Constantinople, 1691.

SOLIMENA, Francis, so'-le-mai'-na, an Italian painter, whose reputation was so great that many princes of Europe gave him invitations to their courts, which he declined. The emperor Charles VI. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He was also a poet. b. near Naples, 1657; d. at Naples, 1747.

SOLINUS, Caius Julius, so-li'-nus, a Roman writer, whose "Polyhistor," a compilation of historical and geographical remarks, was published by Mommsen at Berlin, in 1864. Solinus has been called Pliny's ape, from his having so closely followed that writer. Supposed to have lived in the 3rd century.

SOLIS, Juan Diaz de, so'-lees, an eminent Spanish navigator, who, with Pinzon, discovered Yucatan, in 1503, explored the bay of Rio Janeiro in 1512, and learning from the natives that a great river (Paraguay) existed further along the coast, he set sail for Spain, and obtained the king's permission to make conquests upon its banks. He returned to Rio Janeiro, and proceeding in a south-westerly route, landed near a river between Realdonado and Montevideo; but was there killed by the Indians, in 1515. This river is the Rio de Solis.

SOLIS, Antonio de, a Spanish historian and dramatic poet, who became secretary to Philip IV., and historiographer of the Indies, but afterwards entered into holy orders. He wrote many comedies and poems, but his great work is the "History of the Conquest of Mexico." It has been translated into English by Townsend. b. at Placentia, 1610; d. 1680.

SOLOMON, Ben Virga, sol-o-mon, a Spanish rabbi and physician, who wrote a history of the Jews, from the destruction of the Temple to his own time, a Latin version of which was printed at Amsterdam in 1651. Flourished in the 16th century.

SOLOMON, Ben Job Jalla, an African prince, who being sent by his father, in 1731, to the sea-coast to sell slaves, was taken prisoner, and sold to an English captain, by whom he was carried to America, and disposed of to a planter. General Oglethorpe purchased his freedom, and brought him to England. While in England he was employed in the library of Sir Hans Sloane in translating Arabic manuscripts. He

SOLOX, so'-lon, legislator of Athens, and one of the seven wise men of Greece, was descended from the royal house of Codrus, and was the relation of Pisistratus. After studying philosophy at Athens, he travelled into various countries to increase his knowledge. On his return home, he found his countrymen divided by faction, and the state reduced to a wretched condition. Having composed a poem upon the loss of Salamis, he recited it in the Agora with so much effect that an expedition was organized for the recovery of the place. Of that undertaking, Solon was appointed the chief, and the result proving brilliantly successful, he became the most popular man in the state, and was soon afterwards unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He discharged his high office with great wisdom and integrity, introducing reforms in every department, ameliorating the condition of the poor, and amending the rigorous code of Draco. After completing his legislation, he asked to be allowed to retire from Athens for ten years, which request being acceded to, he went upon a journey into Egypt and Asia Minor. Subsequently to his return, Pisistratus became tyrant of Athens, and Solon, finding that he could not prevent his retaining absolute power, encouraged him to rule the people with moderation. b. in the island of Salamis, about 638 b.c.; d. about 659 b.c. For an account of Solon's laws, see Thirlwall's "History of Greece," vol. ii.

SOLTIKOV, Simon, sol'-ti-kof, a Russian general, who was the favourite of the empress Elizabeth, and commanded the army which defeated Frederick the Great at Kunnersdorf. He became a marshal, and governor of Moscow. d. 1772.

SOLTIKOV, Ivan, a Russian general, and son of the preceding, conducted two highly successful campaigns against the Swedes, and was in 1796 made a marshal by Paul I., and, in the following year, governor of Moscow. d. at Moscow, 1805.

SOLTIKOV, Count Sergius, was of the same family as the preceding, and was the first lover of Catharine II., while she was yet grand-duchess. He was banished from the court by the empress Elizabeth, and took up his residence in Sweden, where he died.

SOMERS, John, Lord, sum'-ers, an eminent English lawyer and writer upon jurisprudence, who was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, whence he removed to the Middle Temple. He distinguished himself at the bar, and in 1681 was concerned in writing a piece entitled "A Just and Modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the last two Parliaments." He was one of the counsel for the seven bishops: in the Convention Parliament he represented the city of Worcester, and, after the flight of James II., was one of the managers for the House of Commons, at a conference with the Lords about the word "abdicated." After the Prince of Orange ascended the English throne as William III., Somers was appointed solicitor-general, and, in 1692, attorney-general and lord keeper. In 1697 he was made chancellor, with the title of Lord Somers; but in 1700 the seals were taken from him, and he was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours; he was, however, acquitted by the Lords. Between the years 1708-10 he was president of the council under Queen Anne; but, after the latter date, his health became too infirm to admit of his playing any important part in the politics of his time. A collection of scarce pamphlets, principally from his library, was published in 1743, under the title of "Somers's Tracts," and afterwards, in 1815, upon which occasion the "Tracts" were edited by Sir Walter Scott. The principal works of Lord Somers were, "Brief History of the Succession of the Crown of England," and "The Security of Englishmen's Lives; or, the Trust, Powers, and Duties of the Grand Juries of England." Burke, in his "Reflections on the Revolution in France," observed: "I never desire to be thought a better Whig than Lord Somers, or to understand the principles of the Revolution of 1688 better than those by whom it was brought about." Lord Somers was a great constitutional lawyer, a virtuous patriot, and a patron of learning. b. at Worcester, about 1650; d. 1716.

SOMERSET, Robert Carr, more properly Ker, Viscount Rochester, and afterwards Earl of som'-er-set, one of the favourites of James I., was a descendant of the Kers of Fernihurst, and was at first a sewer or page to the earl of Dunbar. Sir Thomas Overbury, while on a visit to Scotland, became acquainted with him, and brought him to London, where he was introduced to the notice of King James, who took him into favour, with the intention of teaching him Latin. The handsome Ker rose rapidly; he was created a knight of the Bath, Viscount Rochester, and, upon his marriage with the profligate countess of Essex, in 1613, earl of Somerset. The accomplished Sir Thomas Overbury had assisted Ker with his pen until this period. He had, however, always opposed the marriage, and when he found that his advice had been so completely disregarded, his resentment towards the countess of Essex was expressed in bitter satire, and in conversation. Through the machinations of the countess, Overbury was committed to the Tower, where, some time afterwards, his death took place in a mysterious manner. (See OVERBURY, Sir Thomas.) During two years, the earl of Somerset and his wife rested under the suspicion of having got rid of Overbury by poison. In 1615, James having by this time taken into his favour George Villiers, another handsome youth, Somerset and his countess were brought to trial. Their guilt was clearly established; nevertheless, they escaped, while their agents were executed. Somerset lost the king's favour, and retired to the country with his wife, upon a pension of £4000 per annum. The old king invited him to court a year before his death; but Ker never again appeared in public life. d. 1645.

SOMERVILLE, William, som'-er-vil, an English poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, settled upon his paternal estate, where he diverted his leisure with poetical composition. He wrote "The Chase," "Field Sports," and some fables and tales. b. at Edstone, Warwickshire, 1692; d. 1742.

SOMERVILLE, Mrs. Mary, an eminent modern scientific writer, who is stated to have been instructed in the mathematical and physical sciences by her father, an officer in the Royal Marines. After becoming the wife of Dr. Somerville, she distinguished herself by making some experiments on the magnetic influence of the solar rays of the spectrum. It was to Lord Brougham, however, that her introduction to scientific literature was chiefly due. That enlightened nobleman engaged her to supply the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge with a popular resumé of the great work of the French mathematician Laplace, entitled the "Mécanique Céleste." The popular account of this profound work was given to the public under the title of "The Mechanism of the Heavens," in 1832. She subsequently produced, "On the Connection of the Physical Sciences," and "Physical Geography." Her services to literature were acknowledged by an honorary membership of the Royal Astronomical Society, and a pension of £300 per annum from the civil list fund. In her admirable works, such abstruse subjects as gravitation, the figure of the earth, the tides, heat, electricity, and comets, are treated of with a clearness, casiness, and precision of style which make her writings most valuable to the non-scientific reader. b. at Burntisland, Fifeshire, 1790.

SOMMARIVA, Giovanni Battista de, som'-ma-re'-va, director of the Cisalpine republic, was educated for the law, and practised as an advocate until the outburst of the French Revolution, when, adopting the republican theories, which at that period were the passport of an able and ambitious man to fame and position, he became secretary-general of the directory of the Cisalpine republic, and subsequently director. After the Austrian occupation, he took up his residence at Paris. He was a man of cultivated tastes, and expended the whole of his large fortune in forming a collection of art-treasures which became famous throughout Europe. b. at Milan, about 1760; d. 1828.

SOMNER, William, som'-ner, a learned English antiquary, who published "The Antiquities of Canterbury," a "Saxon Dictionary," and a treatise on "The Roman Ports and Forts in Kent." b. at Canterbury, 1666; d. 1669.

SONNERAT, Pierre, son'-ne-ra, an eminent French traveller, who, early in life, was taken by his father to the Isle of France (Mauritius). His life was spent in travelling and exploration. He introduced the bread-fruit, the cocoa, and other trees to the Islands of France and Bourbon. His principal works were, "Voyage to New Guinea," and "Voyage to the East Indies and China." b. at Lyons, 1745; d. 1814.

SONNINI DE MANONCOURT, Charles Nicholas Sigisbert, son'-ne-ne, an eminent French naturalist, who entered the service of his country as marine engineer, and in 1772 was dispatched to the colony of Cayenne, where he rendered great services, for which he was made lieutenant. He was subsequently engaged as engineer in Africa, and, after travelling in Greece and Asia Minor, returned to France; but his post having been taken from him at the Revolution, he devoted himself to science. He wrote "Travels in Upper and Lower Egypt," "Travels in Greece and Turkey," and also contributed to the "Natural History" of Buffon. b. at Lunéville, 1751; d. at Paris, 1812.

SONTAG, Henrietta, son'-tag, one of the most distinguished singers of her age, was sprung from a theatrical family, and trod the stage when yet a child; playing juvenile parts in the theatres of Darmstadt, Berlin, and Prague. Her precocious talents obtained her admission into the music-school of that city; where she laid the foundation of the sound knowledge of her art for which she was so highly distinguished. Before she was eighteen she was the prima donna of the Berlin stage, and the idol of the society of that capital; whence she soon afterwards went to Paris. She appeared in both Paris and London in 1828, where her youth and beauty, her fresh and charming voice, and the high finish and exquisite purity of her style, gave universal delight. She left England at the end of the season, not to return for many years. Her retirement from the stage, in consequence of her marriage with Count Rossi, a Piedmontese nobleman, known both as a soldier and a diplomatist, immediately followed. After the death of her husband, she returned to the stage, and Majesty's season, and received with warm applause by them who again thronged to hear her. Madame Sontag paid a visit to America in 1852, and after making a triumphant tour over the United States, was induced to go to Mexico, where unhappily she fell a victim to cholera while preparing to make her first appearance before the inhabitants of the city of Montezuma. d. at Coblenz, 1855; d. 1854.

SOPHIA, sop-fi-a, Princess and regent of Russia, was the daughter of Alexis Michaelowitch by his first marriage, as Peter the Great was the offspring of the second. When Peter and Ivan V. were proclaimed joint sovereigns of Russia, Sophia was intrusted with the high functions of regent. She was an ambitious and turbulent woman, and excited a revolt against Peter, whom she wished to remove from the government, but was defeated and banished. She died in a convent, 1704.

SOPHOCLES, sop'-o-kleez, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens. His first tragedy was produced upon the stage b.c. 483, and upon that occasion he won the prize, although he contended against Æschylus, the greatest dramatist of his time. In 440 b.c. he brought out his thirty-second play; after which he distinguished himself as a statesman and a general. Sharing the command with Pericles, he bore an honourable part in several battles. Of his private life nothing is known. He is stated to have composed 130 plays, and, although he had Æschylus, Euripides, and other illustrious writers for rivals, he gained the first prize twenty times. Only seven complete plays of his are extant. There are several English translations of his works. b. 495 b.c.; d. 408 b.c.

SOPHONISBA, sop'-o-nis'-ba, the daughter of Hasdrubal, general of the Carthaginian forces, and the wife of Syphax, king of Numidia. When her husband was defeated by Masinissa, she fell into the hands of the victor, who married her. This union, however, was soon inter-

SOBEY, Henry Clinton, sor'-be, a modern English zoologist, who contributed some excellent papers on the structure of rocks to the "Transactions" and "Proceedings" of the learned societies of England. He was elected fellow of the Royal Society in 1857. b. at Sheffield, 1826.

SOSTRATUS, sos'-tra-tus, a celebrated architect of Cnidus, who was invited to Egypt by Ptolemy Philadelphus, at whose command he constructed the tower of Pharos, in the Bay of Alexandria, on which he placed this inscription:—"Sostatus of Cnidus, son of Luxiphanes, to the gods who protect navigation." This structure was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. He flourished 273 b.c.

SOTHLEY, William, soth'-le, an English writer, who, after serving as an officer in the 10th dragoons, retired to his estate near Southampton, where, as well as in London at a subsequent period, he devoted his leisure to literature. He produced some tragedies and poems, and translated Wieland's "Oberon," the "Georgics," "Iliad," and "Odyssey." b. 1757; d. 1833.

SOTHLEY, Edward Askew, soth'-lee, an English comedian who gained considerable celebrity for his clever impersonation of "Lord Dundreary," in a play called "The American Consul," written by himself. He played this character in England and America about 2000 times. b. at Liverpool, 1830.

SOTO, Domingo, so'-to, a learned Spanish divine, who studied at Alcalá and at Paris; after which he entered among the Dominicans. He became professor of divinity at Salamanca, and was appointed confessor to Charles V., who sent him to the Council of Trent. His principal works are, "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans," commentaries upon Aristotle, and some Latin treatises on theology. b. at Segovia, 1494; d. at Salamanca, 1560.—There was another Dominican of this name, who went to England with Philip II., husband of Mary, for the purpose of restoring the Roman Catholic religion in the two universities. He wrote some theological works. d. 1563.

SORBIÈRE, Samuel, sor'-be-air, a French writer, who abandoned the study of divinity for that of physic. He corresponded with Hobbes, whose letters he used to send to Gassendi as his own, and having transcribed the answers, sent them to Hobbes, who, in consequence, conceived a high opinion of his abilities. His "Journey to England" is full of gross falsehoods, and his other works are trifling. b. in France, 1615; d. at Rome, 1670.

SOREBONNE, Robert de, sor'-ban, a learned French ecclesiastic, and founder of the college at Paris which bears his name, was stored Havannah, which had been despoiled by some French pirates. In 1539 he penetrated into Florida, and made several expeditions to the neighbouring countries, in one of which he was slain, about 1542.

SOUBISE, Benjamin de Rohan, Baron of Frontenai, soo'-beese, a celebrated French Huguenot general, was the brother of the duke de Rohan, the chief of the Reform party, and acquired the art of war under Maurice of Nassau, in Holland. In 1621 the Protestant Assembly of Rochelle invested him with the command in Brittany, Anjou, and Poitou, Louis XIII. in person besieged him in St. Jean d'Angely, and summoned him to surrender; upon which Soubise wrote in reply, "I am his majesty's very humble servant; but the execution of his commands is not in my power,—BENJAMIN DE ROMAN." The place was, however, taken by the king, after an obstinate defence of a month. Soubise received the royal pardon, but he did not desert the cause of the Reformation; and in 1622, at the head of 8000 men, made himself master of Olonne and threatened Nantes. On being again defeated and proscribed as a rebel, he fled to Rochelle, and afterwards repaired to England and next to Germany, to implore succours; but failed in both countries. He received the royal pardon in 1632, and remained peaceable during three years; but, at the termination of that period, suddenly seized upon the Isle of Rhé, made a dash upon the royal fleet at Blavet, in Brittany, boarded and took the vessels, and cannonaded the fort, by which he was repulsed. He, however, maintained the command of the sea between Nantes and Bordeaux. Proclaimed admiral of the Protestant church, he next gave battle to the royal fleet, but was defeated, after a smart engagement; upon which he attacked the royalists at the Isle of Rhé with 3000 men. Again vanquished, he had recourse to flight, and, passing over to England, induced Charles I. to interpose in his behalf. Although Charles obtained his pardon, Soubise remained in England, and soon afterwards sailed with an English fleet, under the command of the duke of Buckingham, for Rochelle, where they were refused admittance. A second expedition, under Donbligh, the brother-in-law of Buckingham, also failed. Still Soubise persevered; and a third expedition was about to set sail from Portsmouth, when Buckingham, who was to have had the command of it, was assassinated by Felton. The English officers who had seen Soubise and the duke in animated conversation a few hours before, and not being acquainted with the French language, accused the Huguenot leader of the murder. Soubise would probably have been sacrificed to the popular resentment, had not Felton come forward and admitted the deed. The earl of Lindsey took the command; but, while he and Soubise were quarrelling together, the Rochellais were compelled to capitulate. His after-years, during which he was constantly intriguing against the French monarchy, were passed in England. n. 1680; p. in England, 1641.

SOUCHAI, Jean Baptiste, sou'-shai, a French writer, who was counsellor to the king, and professor of eloquence in the royal college. He published a translation of Sir Thomas Browne's "Vulgar Errors," an edition of Ausonius, and dissertations in the "Memoirs" of the Academy of Belles-Lettres. n. 1687; p. 1746.

SOUCHET, Stephen, sou'-ss-ai, a French divine, who was librarian in the college of Louis the Great. His works are, "Astronomical Observations made in China;" "Dissertations on Difficult Passages of Scripture;" "Dissertations against the Chronology of Sir Isaac Newton." n. in France, 1671; p. 1744.

SOUFFLOT, James Germain, souf'-flo, a French architect, who improved himself in Italy, and, on his return to France, became superintendent of the royal buildings. His greatest work is the church of St. Gervaise at Paris. n. near Auxerre, 1713; p. 1781.

French novelist and dramatist, who was educated for the bar, and was admitted as an advocate; but, obtaining little practice, turned his attention to literature, for which he had always a marked predilection. He produced a small collection of poems, in a volume entitled "Amours Françaises," which attracted no notice. The young author, left without any resources, was compelled to take service as foreman to an upholsterer. In this situation he remained until 1823, when his drama entitled "Romeo and Juliet" having been successful upon the stage, he was enabled to take his place among the littérateurs of his day. With the production of "Clotilde" his reputation as a dramatist was fixed. He next commenced contributing romances to the French newspapers, and succeeded so well in this new walk, that in a short time he became the most popular romancer of the day. This position he occupied until 1843, when Dumas and Eugène Sue, following in his steps, somewhat eclipsed his fame. He remained, however, a popular writer until his death. His best romances are, "Mémoires du Diable," "Deux Cadavres," and "L'Homme de Lettres." n. at Foix, department of Ariège, 1800; p. at Bièvre, 1847.

SOULOUQUE, or FAUSTIN I., sou'-look', emperor of Hayti, was born a slave, but was manumitted while in his childhood. At 14 he assisted in expelling the French from Hayti. He rose through the different grades of the republican army, until, in 1849, he declared himself emperor; in which capacity he proved at once ignorant, violent, and cruel. He was driven from Hayti in 1859, and, after first seeking an asylum at Jamaica, retired to the south of France. n. 1789; p. 1867.

SOULT, Nicolas Jean-de-Dieu, soult, Marshal of France and Duke of Dalmatia, the son of a notary, was designed for the same profession; but while at college, he evinced so great a distaste for study, that he was permitted to follow the bent of his own inclinations, which were decidedly military; and, accordingly, he entered the army as a private soldier in 1795. His progress was at first slow enough; in 1791 he was but a sergeant. In that year, however, Marshal Luckner having noticed him, gave him a commission as sub-lieutenant, and appointed him to drill a regiment of volunteers. During the subsequent nine years, Soult distinguished himself in more than twenty battles, and his rise was consequently rapid. He was a general in 1800, at which time he was appointed commander-in-chief in Piedmont. During the short suspension of hostilities which followed the peace of Amiens, he resided at Paris, where he lost no opportunity of conciliating the favour of Bonaparte, who was at first prejudiced against him. He succeeded so well, that, although he had never fought under Napoleon, he was one of the marshals created by the emperor on his coronation. He was next appointed to organize the great army assembled upon the heights of Boulogne, and called the Army of England. His conduct at Austerlitz, in 1805, was so brilliant that, after the battle, Napoleon thanked him, and called him one of the best of living strategists. Now acknowledged as among the most skilful of the French generals, he maintained this brilliant reputation throughout the German campaign of 1806-7. In 1808 he was sent to Spain; and, after having entered Madrid, was directed to intercept Sir John Moore, who was marching from Portugal. The English commander, apprehensive of being hemmed in, commenced his retreat upon Corunna, whither he was followed by Soult; but, upon that glorious field, where Sir John Moore fell, the English made a stand, and inflicted a decisive repulse upon their assailants, who suffered too much to be able to prevent the British troops from embarking in their vessels. Soon afterwards Soult was met by his great opponent Wellington, who, passing the Douro, drove the French general from his position, captured nearly all his artillery, and his suite and baggage. Soult made a masterly retreat through Galicia and upon Zamora. He next superseded Marshal Jourdan as major-general of the army of Spain. In 1810 he established himself in the rich province of Andalusia, and, in order to relieve Massena in Portugal, he was commanded by Napoleon to besiege Badajoz, which was taken in the following year. Massena was, nevertheless, compelled to evacuate Portugal, after many fruitless attacks upon the strong lines of Torres Vedras. Thus relieved of a formidable opponent, Wellington resolved to retake Badajoz. Soult prepared to relieve the fortress, but was totally defeated at Albuera. The English were, however, compelled to raise the siege in consequence of the advance of Marmont. But in 1813 Wellington reappeared before Badajoz, which, after a terrible conflict, was captured by him. Soult was thus compelled to retreat from Seville; the defeat of Marmont at Salamanca, and the surrender of Madrid to Wellington, caused Soult to abandon Andalusia, which he had held during three years. In 1813 he was recalled from the Peninsula by the emperor; but the disaster experienced by the French at Vittoria compelled Napoleon to send him to Spain. Now followed the most brilliant period of Soult's career, one wherein he displayed consummate skill as a general; but he was overmatched by the English commander, who, although Soult defended himself undauntedly wherever he could take up a position, drove the enemy before him, until French territory was entered and Toulouse taken possession of, in 1814. After the abdication of Napoleon, Soult attached himself to the Bourbons, and was appointed minister of war; but when Napoleon reappeared in Paris, he again took service under his old master. As quartermaster-general he fought at Waterloo, after which he was banished from France. He was, nevertheless, permitted to return in 1819. Charles X. created him a peer; he became minister of war under Louis Philippe, who sent him as his representative to the coronation of Queen Victoria. The same monarch also created him marshal-general of France, a dignity which had lain in abeyance since the death of Marshal Turenne. Soult was only excelled in his knowledge of the art of war by Napoleon and his great opponent, the duke of Wellington. His conduct in the province of Andalusia, where he levied cruel extortions upon the population, and robbed the convents and mansions of the nobles of the pictures or whatever valuables his agents could pounce upon, reflects great discredit upon his name. n. at St. Amand-du-Tarn, either 1765 or 1769; n. at the castle of Soult-Berg, 1851.

orator of the university. In the following year he was appointed chaplain to Lord Clarendon. In 1676 he accompanied the English ambassador to congratulate Sobieski on his election as king of Poland, of which country he wrote an account. After his return he was presented to the rectory of Islip, in Oxfordshire. Though he concurred in the Revolution of 1683, he refused a bishopric. His sermons are remarkable for their wit and eloquence. n. at Hackney, 1633; n. 1716.

SOUTH, Sir James, an eminent modern English astronomer, was educated for the medical profession, and practised as a surgeon during several years. His devotion to the pursuit of astronomical science led him to relinquish his first profession in order to prosecute his researches. For his laborious observations relative to the double stars, he was awarded the gold medal of the Royal Society, together with Sir John Herschel. Of the same society he was elected a fellow in 1821. About 1826 he removed to the observatory at Campden Hill, Kensington. He was knighted at the accession of William IV., in 1830; and, upon the same occasion, received an epistle intimating that the sum of £300 per annum should be placed at his disposal for the prosecution of astronomical inquiry. He contributed many papers of the highest value to the "Annals of Philosophy," the "Quarterly Journal of Science," and to the "Memoirs" of the Astronomical Society. He was also a member of the Imperial Academy of Science, St. Petersburg, and of the Brussels Royal Society of Sciences. n. in London, 1755; n. 1897.

SOUTH, John F., an eminent modern English surgeon, and brother of the preceding, was one of the surgeons of St. Thomas's Hospital, and son College of Surgeons, London. He wrote a number of valuable works upon zoology, as well as upon subjects more immediately connected with his profession; as "Household Surgery; or, Hints on Emergencies," "A Description of the Bones," "The Dissector's Manual." n. in London, early in the 18th century.

SOUTHCOTT, Joanna, south'-kot, a notorious English visionary, and founder of a sect, who, until her 40th year, had been employed as a domestic servant at Exeter. In 1792 she suddenly came forward in the character of a prophetess, and, for a time, drove a considerable trade as the vendor of sealed packets, which were to insure everlasting bliss hereafter to the purchasers. She then repaired to London, where her "warnings," and "prophecies," and "communications," had a large sale. Her confidence increasing, she announced herself as having conceived the "Second Shiloh." A cradle was made for the forthcoming Prince of Peace, large sums were collected, and, on the night when the acconchment was predicted to take place, crowds of her followers assembled before her house to hear the first tidings of the event. But the time passed away without any second Shiloh appearing. At her death, which occurred shortly afterwards, it was ascertained that she had been suffering from dropsy. n. in Devonshire, 1750; n. 1814.

SOUTHERN, Thomas, suth'-ern, a dramatic writer, who entered himself at the Middle Temple, but afterwards abandoned law for literature. His principal dramatic works were,

SOUTHEY, Robert, son-in-law, an eminent English poet and general writer, was the son of a "bendrappr" at Bristol, and was sent to a master school in 1753, from which establishment he was dismissed four years afterwards, in consequence of having a sarcastic attack upon the system of corporal punishment pursued in the school. He was, however, entered of Balliol College, Oxford, being intended that he should take holy orders. For this pursuit he himself had little sympathy; indeed, he was quite unqualified for it, being then a sceptic both in politics and religion. At Oxford he declared that he learned only two things—to row and to swim; but, even while there, that literary industry, which is almost without a parallel, became a habit with him. About a year after leaving Oxford, he made the acquaintance of Coleridge, and the two poets married on the same day two sisters. After supporting himself for a short time by lecturing on history, at Bristol, he sold his poem, entitled "Joan of Arc," to Cottle, the Bristol bookseller, for fifty guineas. His maternal uncle, the Rev. Mr. Hill, chaplain of the British factory at Lisbon, at whose expense Southey had been kept at Oxford, visited England shortly after his nephew's first appearance as a poet, and endeavored to induce him to enter the Church; but although Southey had by this time become reconciled to her doctrines, he steadily refused to take orders. On his uncle's return to Lisbon, Southey accompanied him, aimed in Spain and Portugal.

In 1793 he produced "Letters from Spain and Portugal;" and, in the following year, entered himself as a student of the law at Gray's Inn. He wrote to his publisher, "I advance with sufficient rapidity in Blackstone and 'Madoe.' I hope to finish my poem and begin my practice in about two years." At the end of this time the poem was completed, but the law was given up as impracticable. After a second visit to Lisbon, he obtained, upon his return to England, an appointment as private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland; but in six months the poet relinquished what he called "a foolish office and a good salary." This was in 1801, and with this year dates his entrance upon literature as a profession. He obtained sufficient employment from the booksellers, and after making several successful appearances as an author, he, in 1804, settled at Gretna Hall, near Keswick, Cumberland, where the remaining years of his life were passed. In 1807 he received a pension from the government; in 1813 he succeeded Mr. Pye as poet laureate, and under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, a second pension of £300 per annum was bestowed upon him. He was at the same time offered a baronetcy by Sir Robert; but this Southey declined, because too poor to support the dignity. He lost his first wife in 1837, and two years later was united to Miss Caroline Bowles, the poetess. He was the author of more than 100 volumes of poetry, history, travels, &c.; and, moreover, produced 156 papers of various lengths, upon history, biography, politics, and general literature. The principal efforts of his life of unwearied industry were,

His "Life and Correspondence," edited by his son, were published in 1850. His son-in-law, the Rev. J. Wood Warter, also gave to the public his commonplace books. B. at Bristol, 1774; D. at Keswick, Cumberland, 1813.

SOUTHEY, Caroline Anne Bowles, Mrs., a popular poetess, and wife of the preceding, was the only child of Captain Charles Bowles, of Buckland, near Lymington. Her earliest production was the "Birthday." But for more than twenty years, the writings of Caroline Bowles were published anonymously, and it was not until after the publication of "Ellen Fitz-Arthur," and several of the pathetic novelettes which she had contributed to "Blackwood's Magazine" under the title of "Chapters on Churchyards," that her name and identity became known beyond a limited circle. Among the friends who had been attracted to her by her genius, in the earlier part of her career, were the poets Southey and Bowles, the former of whom became her husband in 1839. At the date of the marriage, Southey had been a widower two years, his former wife having been virtually dead to him for many more. On his death, Mrs. Southey was left with means insufficient, in her state of health, to provide the ordinary comforts of life; but was placed on the Civil List for a pension of £200 a year. The principal of Mrs. Southey's works are, "Ellen Fitz-Arthur: a Poem;" "The Widow's Tale, and other Poems;" "Solitary Hours," prose and verse; "Chapters on Churchyards;" "Tales of the Factories;" and "Robin Hood, a Fragment, by the late Robert Southey and Caroline Bowles; with other Poems." B. 1787; D. 1854.

SOUTHWELL, Robert, an English Jesuit, who was descended of an ancient Norfolk family, after receiving his education upon the continent, and becoming prefect of the Jesuits' College at Rome, went to England as a missionary. In 1592 he was apprehended on a charge of conspiring against the government of Queen Elizabeth; but, although he was put to the torture ten times, nothing could be elicited from him, further than that he had come to England for the purpose of making converts to the Roman Catholic faith. In 1595 he was tried in the court of King's Bench, found guilty, and hanged at Tyburn. He wrote a number of works, both in prose and verse, upon theological matters. B. 1560; hanged, 1595.

SOUVESTRE, Emile, soo'-vestr, a modern French writer, who studied the law, and attempted to set up as an advocate at Rennes; but, not obtaining practice, went to Paris, where he wrote a drama entitled "The Siege of Missolonghi," which, after some delay, was accepted at the Théâtre Français; but it was so mutilated under the pruning-knife of the censor, as to become unfitted for theatrical representation. Left without resources, he became assistant to a bookseller at Nantes. In 1830 he commenced writing for the provincial newspapers. In 1836 he produced a work upon the manners, customs, and literature of Brittany, the "Wales of France," the materials for which he had been collecting during several years. The work was eminently successful, and in 1836 Souvestre again repaired to Paris; but on this occasion under favourable auspices. During the subsequent eighteen years, he occupied a high position as a contributor to the "Revue des Deux Mondes," the "National," the "Siècle," and other leading Paris publications. His best works were, "Les Confessions d'un Ouvrier," "La Maison Rouge," "Voyage dans le Finistère," "Le Riche et le Pauvre," and "Un Philosophe sous les Toits," which last has been translated into English under the title of "An Attic Philosopher." All his books exhibit the workings of a pure and thoughtful poet who was at first engaged in various capacities, but subsequently devoted himself to literature. His works, which are numerous, are chiefly composed in Spanish. As a critic, he was, says Machado, long revered as an oracle. His principal works are, a vast collection of sonnets, "Commentary on the Lusiad," "Epitome of the History of Portugal," and an account of the labours of the Jesuit missionaries in China. n. at Souto, Portugal, 1590; n. at Madrid, 1649.

SOBERO, José Maria, a Portuguese diplomatist, who represented his country at the courts of Sweden and France. An enthusiastic admirer of Camoens, the greatest poet of Portugal, he devoted his leisure to the production of a standard edition of that writer's works. The edition was brought out in 1818. He also purposed to write the "History of Portugal," but failing health prevented his accomplishing the task. n. at Oporto, 1753; n. 1825.

SPANHEIM, Ezekiel, a learned German writer and statesman, the eldest son of the preceding, was appointed professor of eloquence at Geneva at the age of 20. He soon afterwards became tutor to the son of Charles Louis, elector palatine, who employed him in several important missions. From this service he passed into that of the elector of Brandenburg, who made him a baron and minister of state. After the peace of Ryswick he was sent to France, and thence to England. His principal works are, commentaries upon ancient authors, a dissertation, in Latin, upon ancient coins, letters and dissertations on medals; and he translated from the Greek into French, the "Cæsars" of Julian, with notes. n. at Geneva, 1629; n. in England, 1710.

SPANHEIM, Frederick, a learned divine, brother of the preceding, was educated at Leyden, where he took his degree of doctor in divinity; after which he became professor in that faculty at Heidelberg, and next at Leyden. His principal work is an Ecclesiastical History. n. at Geneva, 1633; n. 1701.

SPARKS, Jared, sparks, a modern American biographical writer, who was educated for the service of the Unitarian ministry; upon the occasion of whose ordination, in 1819, Dr. Channing preached his famous sermon on "Unitarian Christianity." His earliest publications were chiefly upon theological and controversial subjects; but, in 1829, he produced his first work in biography, under the title of "Life of John Ledyard, the American Traveller." His subsequent publications were, "The Writings of George Washington, selected and published from 200 folio volumes of Original Manuscripts," in 12 volumes,—a national work; "The Life of Washington;" "The Life of

In 1839 he was appointed professor of ancient and modern history in Harvard University. Washington Irving speaks of Mr. Jared Sparks "as among the greatest benefactors to American literature." s. at Willington, Connecticut, in 1789; d. March 15, 1866.

SPARRMANN, Andrew, spar'-man, an eminent Swedish naturalist and traveller, who accompanied Captain Cook in his voyage round the world. He also resided for some time at the Cape of Good Hope. After his return to Stockholm, he was, upon the death of Baron Geer, the entomologist, appointed to succeed him as conservator of the museum. His travels, which are as interesting as they are valuable, have been translated into English. Linnæus named a species of plants in his honour. s. in Sweden, about 1747; d. at Stockholm, 1820.

SPARROW, Anthony, spär'-ro, a learned English prelate, who in 1687 was consecrated bishop of Exeter, whence he was translated to Norwich. He wrote, "Rationale upon the Book of Common Prayer," and compiled a collection of articles, injunctions, and canons. s. in Suffolk, about 1620; d. at Norwich, 1685.

SPARTACUS, spar'-ta-kus, a Thracian shepherd, famous for his victories over the Romans. He was one of the gladiators of Lentulus; but, escaping with thirty others, placed himself at the head of a numerous army, with which he defeated the Romans in several battles. At length Crassus was sent against him, and after a bloody contest Spartacus was slain, b.c. 71.

SPARTIANUS, Elcus, spar'-she-ai-nus, a Latin historian, who wrote the lives of the emperors from Julius Cæsar to Diocletian, of which only a few are extant among the "Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ." Flourished in the 3d century.

SPECTER, Erwin, spek'-ter, an eminent German painter, who studied under Cornelius at Munich, after which he repaired to Italy for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the works of the old Italian masters. He was engaged by Cornelius to execute several of the frescoes in the Pinakothek at Munich, but his death took place before the building was ready for his drawings. His principal frescoes were made for the villa of Dr. Abendroth at Hamburg. He also wrote a work, entitled "Letters of a German Artist from Italy." s. at Hamburg, 1806; d. at the same city, 1835.

SPECTER, Otto, a modern German artist, who was the brother of the preceding. He particularly distinguished himself as a designer of subjects for children's books. His drawings of animals are often charmingly quaint. Several of his works have been reproduced in England. s. at Hamburg, 1807.

SPEKE, John Hanning, speek, a famous African traveller, who was an officer in the Indian army. In 1858 he visited Eastern Africa on a journey of exploration, in company with Captain R. F. Burton, and discovered the great equatorial lake Victoria Nyanza. In 1860 he again visited Africa with Captain Grant, and succeeded in establishing the fact that the Victoria Nyanza forms one of the great reservoirs from which issue the waters of the Nile. He lost his life by an accident while shooting in 1864. s. in Somersetshire, 1827. ☞

SPENCE, Joseph, spence, an English divine and writer, who was, in 1742, appointed professor of modern history in the university of Oxford, and in 1754 prebendary of Durham. He wrote an "Essay on Pope's Odyssey," a work, entitled "Polymetis," and a compilation entitled "Anecdotes of Men and Books." s. in Hampshire, 1699; drowned, 1768.

SPENCE, William, an eminent modern English entomologist, who assisted Kirby in producing the celebrated "Introduction to Entomology." He also produced, amongst other smaller treatises, one entitled "Observations relative to the Circulation of Blood in Insects." He was a member of the Royal and Entomological Societies. s. about 1780; d. 1860.

SPENCER, John Charles, Earl (better known as Viscount Althorp), spen'-ser, was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. He first entered the House of Commons as member for Northampton; but from the year 1806 to 1834, when he succeeded to the peerage, he represented the county of Northampton, generally supporting all the important measures advocated by the Whig party. Shortly after the accession of William IV. he was made chancellor of the exchequer; but though manly, liberal, straightforward, and disinterested, he possessed none of the qualifications of the orator. In another and a very different sphere of action, however, he was unrivalled. The improvement of agriculture was at all times his favourite pursuit; and when he retired from office, he applied himself with zeal and energy to the practice and encouragement of that great branch of industry. To his exertions the establishment of the Royal Society of Agriculture was mainly owing; and he was present at nearly all the great agricultural meetings throughout the country, promoting the general good by his example, either as the president or as an exhibitor of prize cattle, as the patron of mechanical and scientific improvements, or as the rewarder of skill and industry. s. 1782; d. 1845.

SPENER, Philip James, spai'-ner, a Lutheran divine, who became counsellor in ecclesiastical affairs to the elector of Brandenburg, but who is rendered remarkable as being the founder of the Pietists, which sect held that the Word of God cannot be understood without the illumination of the Holy Ghost. s. in Alsace, 1635; d. at Berlin, 1705.

SPENSER, Edmund, spen'-ser, an eminent English poet, who was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts; but, not obtaining a fellowship, he quitted the university. His earliest poem was the "Shepherd's Calendar," first published in 1579, which he dedicated to Sir Philip Sidney, who became his patron, and introduced him at court. In 1580 he was appointed by the Earl of Leicester secretary to Lord Gray, viceroy of Ireland, and obtained a grant of lands at Kilkoman, in the county Cork, where he built a house, and finished his celebrated poem entitled the "Faerie Queen." In the rebellion begun by the Earl of Tyrone, he lost his estate and was plundered, upon which he retired to London. He was buried near Chancer, in Westminster Abbey. Pope says, "There is something in Spenser that pleases us as strongly in one's old age as it did in one's youth. I read the 'Faerie Queen' when I was about 12, with a vast deal of delight." Mr. Craik, in his "Sketches of Literature and Learning in England," observes: "Without calling Spenser the greatest of all poets, we may still say that his poetry is the most poetical of all poetry." n. in London, 1553; p. in London, 1599.

SPEERSKI, Michael, spe-ran'-ske, an eminent Russian statesman and administrative reformer, who became secretary of the Imperial council under Alexander I., in which capacity he remodelled the system of taxation, introduced an improved penal code, a new system of finance, and an enlarged plan of national education. n. in the government of Vladimir, 1771; p. 1840.

SPEELING, Otto, spair'-ling, a German physician and botanist, who became physician to the king of Denmark; but, being connected with the plot of Count Ulfeld, he was sent to prison, where he died. He published a catalogue of Danish plants. n. at Hamburg, 1602; p. 1631.

SPEUSIPPUS, spe-sip'-pus, the nephew, disciple, and successor of Plato, is considered as the founder of the Academic school of philosophy; and among his disciples were a number of females. He wrote upon plants, animals, and natural objects; but of his works only a few fragments remain. p. at Athens, B.C. 339.

SPIGELIUS, Adrian, spi-je'-li-us, a learned professor, who filled the chair of anatomy and surgery at Padua. One of his most important works was entitled, "On the Structure of the Human Body." n. at Brussels, 1578; p. 1625.

SPINDLER, Karl, spin'-dler, a modern German novelist, who made his first appearance as an author in 1824. His collected works comprise 100 volumes. Many of his best novels have been translated into English; such as "The Natural Son," "The Jew," "The Jesuit, a picture of Manners and Character," and "The Enthusiast." n. at Breslau, 1795.

SPINOLA, Ambrosio, Marquis of, spe-no'-la, a celebrated Italian general, who entered the service of Philip III. of Spain early in life, and after distinguishing himself against the Dutch, was appointed general-in-chief in the Netherlands. In 1604 he took Ostend, after a desperate siege. This feat greatly enhanced his reputation, which he continued to maintain, although opposed to the brave and skilful Maurice, Prince of Nassau. He afterwards signalized himself in Italy. n. at Genoa, 1569; p. 1630.

SPINOZA, Benedict, spe-no'-za, was the son of a Portuguese Jew, resident at Hamburg. He studied under the chief rabbin, and afterwards applied himself to theology; but, having avowed some sceptical opinions respecting the Mosaic law, he was excommunicated; on which he was baptized and professed the Christian religion. An attempt being made to assassinate him, he deemed it prudent to retire from Amsterdam, first to the house of a physician, named Vanden Ende, and afterwards to the neighbourhood of Leyden, where he employed himself in making microscopes and telescopes, by which he was enabled to earn a subsistence. About 1664 he took up his residence at the Hague, where he spent the remainder of his life. Spinoza invented a system of metaphysics called by his name, the basis of which is, that matter is eternal, and that the universe is God. This he published in a work entitled "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus;" and the same is refined upon in a mathematical form in his posthumous works. (See Hallam's "History of the Literature of Europe," vol. iv.) n. at Amsterdam, 1632; p. at the Hague, 1677.

SPOHN, Frederick Augustus William, spon, an eminent German philosopher, who was educated at the universities of Wittenberg and Leyden, at which latter he, in 1819, was appointed professor of ancient literature. He produced a number of valuable works on philology, criticism, and geography. The most important of these works were, an edition of Homer's "Odyssey;" of Hesiod; a treatise upon Egyptian Hieroglyphics, and a revised edition of the "Panegyrics" of Isocrates. n. at Dortmund, 1792; p. at Leipzig, 1824.

SPOHN, Louis, spon, a celebrated German musician, who was at first a violin player in the private band of the Duke of Brunswick. His reputation commenced with the year 1804, upon the occasion of his travelling over Germany and giving concerts. At the congress of Vienna in 1814, he stood forth against every rival as the first violin player of his time. After a course of travel in Italy, he was, in 1818, appointed director of the music at the theatre at Frankfort-on-the-Maine. About this time he commenced writing those operas which made his name famous throughout Europe. The most popular of these works are, "Azor," "Faust," "Zemira," and "Jessonda." On leaving Frankfort he was appointed chapel-master to the duke of Hesse-Cassel. His oratorios and orchestral pieces are frequently performed in England. His "Violin School" is the best work of the kind which has ever been written. For the Norwich musical festival he expressly composed his oratorio, "The Fall of Babylon," which, together with "The Last Judgment" and "The Crucifixion," are classed among the finest works of their order. He also produced songs, ballads, cantatas, and orchestral pieces, which are highly esteemed in Germany. n. at Seesen, in the duchy of Brunswick, 1783; p. 1859.

SPOX, Charles, spawng, a learned French writer and eminent physician, who practised with great success at Lyons. He published the "Prognostics" of Hippocrates in hexameter verse. n. at Lyons, 1609; p. 1684.

SPOX, Jacob, an eminent French writer, and of the preceding. In 1675 he made a tour in Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant, of which he printed an account. He was the author of many valuable and curious works, as "Recherches des Antiquités de Lyon," "Voyage de la Grèce et du Levant," "Histoire de la Ville et de l'Etat de Genève," 1680. n. at Lyons, 1647; p. 1685.

SPONDANUS, Jean, or DE SPONDE, de(r)-spond, a learned French writer, who produced a commentary on Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey," which was dedicated to the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France. He also edited Aristotle's "Logic." n. 1557; p. 1595.

SPONDANUS, Henry, a learned French writer, and younger brother of the preceding, studied the civil and canon law, and his learning and eloquence attracting the notice of Henry IV., then prince of Bearn, he was made by him master of the requests at Navarre. In 1595 he abjured the Protestant religion, and, taking orders, was preferred to a bishopric in 1643. Spotswood published an Account of Bonnius's Annals. n. 1663; p. 1643.

SPOTSWOOD, or SPOTSWOOD, John, sprɒtswʊd, a learned Scotch prelate. In 1603, upon the accession of James I. to the throne of England, he was one of the Scotch clergy appointed to attend the king, and in the same year was advanced to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and made one of the privy council in Scotland. In 1615 he was translated to the see of St. Andrews. He was afterwards the favourite of Charles I., who, in 1635, made him lord high chancellor of Scotland; but the general dissatisfaction obliging him to leave that court, he retired to London. At the request of James I. he wrote his "History of the Church of Scotland, from the year 203 to the end of the reign of James VI." Burnet, in the "History of his Own Times," says that Spotswood "was a prudent and mild man, but of no great acumen in his course of life; for he was a frequent player at cards, and used to eat often in taverns; besides that, all his livings were scandalously exposed to sale by his servants." n. in the county of Edinburgh, 1565; p. in London, 1639.

SPOTSWOOD, Sir Robert, second son of the preceding, was eminent for his abilities and knowledge of jurisprudence. He was created a lord of session by King James, and afterwards lord president of the same court by King Charles; but was put to death by the Covenanters for adhering to the Marquis of Montrose. Executed 1616.

SPRAGGE, Sir Edward, sprɪdʒ, a distinguished English admiral, was a captain in the first engagement with the Dutch in 1665, when, for gallant conduct, he was knighted by the king on board the Royal Charles. He attracted particular notice of the Duke of Albemarle the four days' battle in 1693; and in the following year he burnt a number of Dutch fire-ships when they came up the Thames, which threw their whole fleet into confusion, and caused them to retreat. In 1671 he destroyed, in the Mediterranean, seven Algerine men-of-war. He was upset in his boat in an engagement with Van Tromp in 1673, as he was going from a disabled ship to another. His remains were recovered and interred in Westminster Abbey.

SPRANGER, Bartholomew, sprɒŋ-ger, an eminent Dutch painter, who, after studying under various masters, went to Italy, where he was patronized by Cardinal Farnese and Pope Pius V. On his return to Germany, he became chamberlain to the emperor Maximilian II., who, his successor, Rudolph, gave him a patent of nobility and a pension. n. at Antwerp, 1540. p. at Prague, about 1625.

SPRAT, Thomas, sprɪt, a learned English bishop, who after the Restoration entered in holy orders, and was one of the first members of the Royal Society, of which he wrote the history. He became chaplain to the king, dean of Westminster, and bishop of Rochester. He was also dean of the chapel royal, and was one of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs in the reign of James II. He, however, complied with the accession of William III. He

This last work is particularly useful to the student of history. It is to be regretted that it extends no later than the year 1783. n. at Rostock, 1746; p. 1803.

SREENGEL, Curt, a celebrated German botanist, physician, and writer upon medicine and medical history. The son of an erudite divine, who superintended his early education, he made such progress in learning, that, in his 14th year, he was not only proficient in Greek, Latin, and some modern languages, but had acquired a fair knowledge of Hebrew and Arabic. At the same early age he also produced a work on botany, in a series of letters entitled "Botany for Ladies." He proceeded to the university of Halle in 1784, and, three years afterwards, took his degree in medicine. In 1789 he was appointed professor extraordinary of medicine at Halle. In 1797, after he had become ordinary professor of medicine in the university, he published at Halle his "Manual of Pathology." He soon afterwards succeeded to the chair of botany, and although he received tempting offers from many other learned bodies, including the university of Berlin, he refused to quit Halle, where he remained until the close of his life. He was an honorary member of more than seventy learned societies. The most important works of this, one of the most learned men of his time, were, "The History of Medicine," "Institutiones Medicæ," in which he gave a complete account of the science of medicine, "Antiquitates Botanicae," "History of the Vegetable Kingdom," written in German; and "Physiologische und Descriptive Botany," a German translation of the "Natural History of Plants" by Theophrastus, and an edition of the "Genera Plantarum" of Linnaeus. n. at Bolderkow, Pomerania, 1786; p. at Halle, 1833.

SREENGEL, William, a celebrated surgeon, and son of the preceding, was professor of surgery at Griefswald. p. 1828.

SPRUNER, Karl von, sprʊn'-ner, an eminent modern German historian and geographer, who pursued his studies at the military school of Munich. He received the commission of lieutenant in 1825, and rose through the intermediate grades, until, in 1855, he was made a major on the staff. Devoted to historical and geographical studies, he employed his leisure in producing a number of works thereon, which are of the highest value. The chief of these works are, "The Country of Bavaria," "Historical Tables of the German States," "Atlas of History and Geography," "Historical Guide to Bavaria," "Historical Chart of Europe," "Prince Rupert the Cavalier," and "Historical Study and Atlas of History and Geography for the use of Schools." For his acquisitions he was appointed a member of the Munich Academy of Sciences and a doctor of philosophy. n. at SPURZHEIM, John Gaspar, spurts'-kime, the associate with Dr. Gall in propagating the system of phrenology. While a student of medicine at Vienna, he attended the lectures of Gall, whose chief follower he became. (See GALL.) With Gall he travelled through Germany, France, and Denmark, lecturing in the principal towns on their system. In 1813 he withdrew from his chief, and repaired to England, where, during three years, he lectured and wrote upon the system. In the interval 1817-25, he resided at Paris; but, in the latter year, he returned to England, where he found his theories had become popular. With the view of disseminating his doctrines, he sailed for the United States in 1832, but died soon after his arrival there. He wrote extensively upon phrenology, and made some important discoveries relative to the anatomy of the brain. n. near Trèves, 1776; n. at Boston, U.S., 1832.

SPURGEON, Rev. Charles, spur'-jon, a Baptist minister of great celebrity, who began to preach at a very early age, and ultimately became possessed of a large chapel called the "Tabernacle," near Kennington Park. n. at Kelvedon, Essex, 1834.

SQUIR, Samuel, squire, a learned English prelate, who became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge; in 1760, dean of Bristol, and in the year following bishop of St. David's. His most important works are, "A Defence of the Ancient Greek Chronology, and an Enquiry into the Origin of the Greek Language;" an "Enquiry into the Nature of the English Constitution;" and "Indifference to Religion inexcusable." n. in Wiltshire, 1714; d. 1766.

STAAL, Madlle. de Launay, Baroness de, etal, a French authoress, who became servant to the duchess of Maine; and, being noticed by Fontenelle for her accomplishments, acquired the friendship of many persons of distinction. She married the Baron de Staal, captain in the Swiss Guards. Her "Memoirs and Letters," which are very curious, were published after her death. n. about 1684; d. 1750.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, stak'-house, an English divine, who wrote, among other works on popular theology, "A Review of the Controversy concerning Miracles," "A System or Body of Practical Divinity," and a "History of the Bible." n. about 1681; d. 1752.

STAEL, Anne Germaine de, stal'-el, a celebrated French authoress, was the daughter of Necker, minister of finance under Louis XVI. After receiving a most careful education, she applied herself to literary composition, and produced several plays and tales; but the first of her works which attracted notice was her "Letters upon the Writings and Character of Rousseau." This appeared in 1778, previously to which she had become the wife of the Baron de Staël-Holstein, the Swedish ambassador, a nobleman very much older than herself. Upon the outburst of the revolution, her parents retired from France; but, as the wife of the representative of a friendly power, she was allowed to remain. Her sympathies were at the outset entirely with the revolution. The sufferings of the royal family, however, awoke in her breast a horror of the abuses which were being perpetrated under the name of liberty. She was even courageous enough to print a defence of Marie Antoinette, under the title of "Reflections upon the Trial of the Queen;" but, during the Reign of Terror, she was compelled to seek safety in exile. Upon the establishment of the Directory, she returned to Paris. Enjoying a large share of influence in political circles, she, from the first, divined and denounced the ambitious projects of Bonaparte. Accordingly, when the successful general became first consul, one of his earliest edicts was the banishment of Madame de Staël from Paris, declaring that he left the whole world open to the eloquent and ambitious lady, but reserved the French capital for himself. She thereupon set out upon a course of travel in Switzerland and Italy, the results of which were expressed in her novels of "Delphine" and "Corinne." In 1810 appeared at Paris, although she herself was banished therefrom, her celebrated work entitled "De l'Allemagne." In this production she portrayed the habits, literature, and political tendencies of the German people. Immediately after publication, 10,000 copies of the book were seized by Napoleon's minister of police. Madame de Staël, from her retreat at Coppet, on the banks of the Lake of Geneva, protested against this act. The minister of police answered: "Your last work is not French, and I have stopped its publication. Your exile is a natural consequence of your constant behaviour for years past. I have thought that the air of France was not suitable to you, for we are not yet reduced so low as to seek for models among the nations you admire." Resolved to escape the galling system of espionage to which she was now subjected by the French police, she set out for Russia, afterwards repairing to England. Her next work, an impassioned denunciation of Napoleon and his arbitrary rule, was named "Ten Years of Exile." She returned to Paris upon the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, and was allowed to remain, even after the emperor's return from Elba. At the restoration of the Bourbons, she retired to Switzerland, and never again interfered with politics. Subsequently to the death of the Baron de Staël, she privately married M. Rocca. In her retirement she occupied herself with the composition of her famous work, entitled "Considerations sur la Révolution Française." In this work, which did not appear until after her demise, she gives a graphic account of the stormy period when France was torn by faction and delivered over to republican fury. Her political associate, Benjamin Constant, says: "If she had painted individuals more frequently and more in detail, her work, though it might have ranked lower as a literary composition, would have gained in interest." Nevertheless, the work contains some admirable sketches of Mirabeau, Calonne, Brienne, Petion, and other leaders of party, with whom she had come into contact. She also produced essays on the "Influence of the Passions," on "Suicide," and on "Fiction." Altogether, she was one of the most remarkable personages of a remarkable age. n. at Paris, 1766; d. in Switzerland, 1817.

STAFFORD, staf'-ford, an ancient English family, originally from Normandy, the founder of which was Robert Tanl, contemporary and follower of William the Conqueror, who created him governor of the castle of Stafford. Several members of this family have played a great part in English history, particularly Humphrey, general of Henry VI., who fought against the duke of York, and, for his services, was recompensed with the dukedom of Buckingham in 1465. Henry, his grandson, succeeded him in the dukedom; and was for some time the favourite of Richard III., whom he seconded in his ambitious schemes; but having revolted against the king, he was, on being captured, decapitated in 1483. His son Edward was charged with treason under Henry VIII., and also perished upon the scaffold in 1521. This house having become extinct in the male line, its honours were continued through William Howard, who married Mary, the heiress of the Staffords.

STAFFORD, William Howard, Viscount, an English nobleman, who is chiefly remarkable in history as the last victim to the Titus Oates plot. He was a Roman Catholic, and had been a staunch adherent to the fortunes of Charles I.; but, according to Burnet, "he thought the king had not rewarded him for his former services as he had deserved; so he often voted against the court, and made great applications always to the Earl of Shaftesbury. He was on no good terms with the Duke of York." Titus Oates denounced him, in 1673, to the House of Commons, as one who had been nominated by the general of the order of Jesuits to the office of paymaster of the forces. Two days afterwards Stafford surrendered himself, and several months later was tried and found guilty, by a majority of the House of Lords, of having, among other crimes, offered rewards to several persons to kill the king. He protested his innocence, both at his trial and subsequently. On the morning before his death he "denied," says Burnet, "all that the witnesses had sworn against him." A bill to reverse his attainder passed the Lords in 1685, but was thrown out in the House of Commons. His widow was, however, created Countess of Stafford for life by James II.: the viscount's attainder was not reversed till 1824. In the succeeding year, Sir George Jermingham, having proved his claim through his descent from the granddaughter of the viscount, was granted the barony. B. 1612; executed 1680.

STAGNELIUS, Eric John, stag-ne-li-us, a poet, and surnamed the Swedish Shelley. He evinced a genius for poetry from a very early age, and shortly after the termination of his career at college, produced his first work, "Vladimir the Great," an epic poem, the subject of which was the conversion of the Russians to Christianity. He held an appointment in the department of Ecclesiastical Affairs of Sweden, and throughout his life continued to produce poems, which are held to surpass all other productions of the same kind in the Swedish language. After his death, his works were collected into three volumes. A complete German translation of his poems appeared in 1851. An English translation of a few of his lyrics was given in the "Foreign Review." B. 1793; D. 1823.

STAHL, George Ernest, stal, a celebrated German chemist, was educated at Jena, where he took his doctor's degree in 1683; but, upon the establishment of the university of Halle, in 1694, he was appointed professor of anatomy and chemistry there. Acquiring great reputation in this office, he was, in 1716, invited to Berlin, and made counsellor of the court and physician to the king. Stahl was more eminent in chemistry than in medicine, because he was less fanciful. He made many important discoveries, the chief being his theory of phlogiston, which, although erroneous in itself, led to the discovery of great truths in chemistry. He composed a number of learned works in Latin, upon medical science, and upon chemistry. His phlogistic theory, which held its ground for nearly a century, was developed in a work entitled "Zymotechnia Fundamentalis." B. at Anspach, 1660; D. at Berlin, 1734.

STAIR, James Dalrymple, Earl of, stair, a Scottish general and statesman, who exerted himself in arousing his countrymen against James II. William III., soon after his accession, nominated Dalrymple a colonel. He served under Marlborough in 1702; represented the English nation at the court of Poland during the interval 1709-13, and in France during the regency. He induced the regent Orleans to expel the Pretender from French territory, and in the reign of George II. became grand-admiral of Scotland, and was made a field-marshal. He was nominated to the command of the English forces in Germany, and gained over Marshal the duke de Noailles the battle of Dettingen, in 1743. B. at Edinburgh, 1673; D. 1747.

STANFIELD, Clarkson, stán'-feeld, an eminent modern English painter, who first studied marine effects, in depicting which he subsequently became so skilful, from the fore-castle of an English man-of-war. Curiously enough, he was a seaman on board the vessel in which Douglas Jerrold served as a midshipman. Abandoning the navy, he became a scene-painter at the old Royalty Theatre, near Well-close Square, in London, at that period a popular resort of English sailors. Becoming eminent as a scene-painter, he was engaged for Drury-lane Theatre. During many years he worked hard for the stage, but found time to paint small pictures of coast-scenery and shipping, and in the latter walk achieved so high a reputation that in 1832 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. Three years later, he became R.A., by which time he had entirely withdrawn himself from theatrical work. From this period he was one of the most brilliant and popular contributors to the yearly exhibitions of the Royal Academy. True to nature, manly in style, and a thorough master of the technicalities of his art, he was one of the greatest ornaments of the English school of landscape painters. Several of his pictures—far from being the best, however—are included in the British collection at the South Kensington Museum. Perhaps his finest productions are, "The Victory, bearing the Body of Nelson, towed into Gibraltar, seven days after the Battle of Trafalgar;" "The Abandoned;" "Port-nà-Spana, near the Giant's Causeway, with the Wrecked Vessels of the Spanish Armada," and "St. Sebastian during the Siege under the Duke of Wellington." A collection of lithographs from his sketches on the Rhine and Moselle was published. He also designed a great many subjects for Heath's "Picturesque Annual." B. at Sunderland, 1793; D. 1867.

STANHOPE, George, stán'-hope, an English divine, who became chaplain to William III. and afterwards to Queen Anne, and also dean of Canterbury. His most important works were, "A Paraphrase and Comment upon the Epistles and Gospels;" translations of Thomas à Kempis; Rochefoucauld's "Maxims;" St. Augustine's STANHOPE, James, first Earl of, a celebrated English nobleman, who early entered upon a military career, and distinguished himself so much at the siege of Namur, in 1695, that William III. gave him a company in the Guards, and the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1705 he served as a brigadier-general under the earl of Peterborough at the siege of Barcelona. He was afterwards made major-general and commander-in-chief of the British forces in Spain by Queen Anne. In 1708 he captured Port Mahon, and obtained possession of the island of Minorca; subsequently gaining the victories of Almanza and Saragossa; but, being intrusted with the defence of Brihuega, was obliged to surrender it, after a gallant resistance, to the duke de Vendôme. George I. appointed him secretary of state, and in 1714 sent him as ambassador to Vienna. In 1717 he was appointed first lord of the Treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer; but relinquished these offices on being created a peer soon afterwards. n. 1673; n. in London, 1721.

STANHOPE, Charles, third Earl of, an English nobleman, chiefly celebrated for his mechanical inventions, the most important of which was the printing-press which is after him. He also designed improvements in the construction of canal locks, and made some researches into the action of the electric fluid. He opposed the ministry of his time, and considered the French revolution as a great step towards social improvement. He wrote a few works, the most remarkable of which were his the father of the celebrated Lady Hester Stanhope. n. 1753; n. 1816.

STANHOPE, Lady Hester, a very highly accomplished, but no less eccentric, English lady, was niece of the celebrated William Pitt. Soon after the death of that statesman, with whom she was domesticated, and for whom she occasionally acted as private secretary, she went to Syria, assumed the dress of a male native of that country, and devoted herself to astrology, in which she was a most implicit believer. She had a large pension from the English government, and for many years was possessed of considerable influence over the Turkish pashas, which, however, when habitual carelessness in money matters had deprived her of the means of bribing them, she so entirely lost as to be in actual danger of her life. Of her manner of living as well as her way of thinking, some notion is conveyed by her reply to an English traveller, who advised her to quit her perilous and desolate abode, and return to England: "As to leaving this country," said her ladyship, "your advice is in vain: I will never return to England. I am encompassed by perils, true; but I am no stranger to them. I have suffered shipwreck off the coast of Cyprus; I have had the plague here; I fell from my horse near Acre, and was trampled upon by him; I have encountered the robbers of the desert; and when my servants quailed, I have galloped in among them, and compelled them to be courteous; and when a horde of plunderers was breaking in at my gate, I sallied out among them sword in hand, and having convinced them that they could not hurt me if they would, I fed them at my gate, and they behaved like thankful beggars. Here I am destined to remain. What is written in the great book of life, who can alter? It is true that I am surrounded by perils; it is true that I am at war with the prince of the mountains, and with the pacha of Acre; it is very true that my enemies are capable of assassination, but if I do perish, my fall shall be a bloody one. I have plenty of arms, good Damascus blades; I use no guns, and while I have an arm to wield a kanjar, these barren rocks shall have a banquet of slaughter before my face looks black in the presence of my enemies." She adhered to her resolution, and breathed her last among foreigners and hirelings. n. 1766; n. 1839.

STANHOPE, Philip Henry, fifth Earl of, an eminent English historian and statesman, who, after completing his education at Oxford, entered the House of Commons as the representative of Wootton Bassett, in 1832. He was afterwards member for Hertford during the interval 1835-52. He held office as under-secretary of state for Foreign Affairs in the short ministry of the duke of Wellington, 1834-5; and again as secretary to the Board of Control, in the administration of Peel, in 1845-6. As an historical writer, his reputation was founded upon his "History of the War of Succession in Spain," and "History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles, 1713 to 1763." He also produced several less important works, such as the "Life of Louis, Prince of Condé;" the "Life of Joan of Arc;" &c. A collection of his essays contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" was published in 1849. The Copyright,

In 1855 he succeeded to the earldom of Stanhope, before which period he had been styled Lord Mahon. n. at Walmer, Kent, 1805.

STANHOPE, Philip Dormer. (See CHESTERFIELD, Earl of.)

S I., stan'-is-laws, king of Poland, was the son of the grand treasurer of that kingdom. In 1704 he was deputed by the assembly at Warsaw to Charles XII. of Sweden, who had just conquered Poland. That monarch caused him to be crowned king at Warsaw in 1705; but when Charles was defeated, in 1709, Stanislaus was obliged to leave his kingdom. On the death of Augustus, in 1733, he returned, in hopes of being acknowledged; but the power of the emperor of Germany and the empress of Russia prevailed against him, and he was again obliged to flee. He died at an advanced age, in consequence of his nightgown taking fire. He was the author of some productions in French and Polish, which were printed under the title of "The Works of a Liberal Philosopher." n. 1677; n. 1768.

STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS PONIATOWSKI, king of Poland, the son of a Lithuanian nobleman, after receiving a liberal education, went upon a course of travel, and resided a considerable time in England, where he became intimate with Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, whom he accompanied in his embassy to St. Petersburg. At this court the elegance of his person and his accomplishments recommended him to the favour of the grand-duchess, afterwards Catherine II., which gave such offence to the Empress Elizabeth, that she made representations to Augustus III., king of Poland, by whom he was recalled. On the death of that monarch, in 1764, Catharine interposed her influence so effectually in behalf of her favourite, that he was elected king of Poland, to the great discontent of a large party of the nobility of that kingdom. Too weak to avert the calamity, Stanislaus saw 13,500 square miles of his kingdom divided between Russia, Prussia, and Austria, in 1772. A second partition took place in 1793. In the following year Kosciuszko gathered together an army, chiefly composed of peasants, with which he fought with the most astonishing bravery against the overwhelming masses of Russia. But, being defeated and taken prisoner, the Russians entered Warsaw. Stanislaus was forced to resign his crown, and the remainder of Poland was, in 1795, divided between Russia, Austria, and Prussia. The unfortunate monarch retired first to Grodno, whence he was called to St. Petersburg, where he remained until his death. b. at Wolczyn, Lithuania, 1732; d. at St. Petersburg, 1793.

STANLEY, Thomas, a learned English writer, who, at the conclusion of his educational career at Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, entered himself at the Middle Temple. He appears to have principally devoted himself to literature, and to have practised the law but little. His most important works are, the "History of Philosophy," and "Lives of Philosophers;" an edition of Ælian's "Various History," and an edition of Æschylus, with a Latin version. b. at Cumberlow, Herts, 1625; d. 1678.

STANLEY, John, an eminent English musician, who became blind at the age of two years, and at seven began to learn music, in which he made such progress that he was placed under Dr. Greene, and at the early age of eleven obtained the place of organist of Allhallows, Bread Street. In 1723 he was chosen organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and in 1734 was elected by the benchers of the Temple their organist. In 1779 he was appointed master of the king's band of musicians. His compositions evince taste and judgment. b. in London, 1713; d. 1786.

STANLEY, Rev. Edward, an eminent English prelate and ornithologist, who, after studying at the university of Cambridge, was, in 1805, presented by his father, Sir John Stanley, to the living of Alderley, in Cheshire, the duties of which he fulfilled during thirty-two years. In 1837 he was promoted to the see of Norwich. A most tolerant and kindly churchman, he took little interest in matters purely controversial, but chose rather to devote his leisure to the pursuit of natural science. He was an accomplished geologist, entomologist, and botanist; but his published works show that ornithology was his favourite study. His "Familiar History of British Birds, their Nature, Habits, and Instincts," is an excellent work, and has passed through many editions. He also contributed articles upon natural history to "Blackwood's Magazine." He was a fellow of the Royal and president of the Linnæan Society. b. in London, 1779; d. 1849.

STANLEY, Very Rev. Arthur Penrhyn, D.D., an English divine and writer, the son of the preceding, was sent at an early age to Rugby, where he earned the esteem and friendship of Dr. Arnold. In 1834 he proceeded to Oxford, and subsequently became fellow and tutor of University College there. In 1851 he was nominated a canon of Canterbury, and subsequently became chaplain to Prince Albert, as well as to the bishop of London. He accompanied the Prince of Wales in his tour to the East, and subsequently became chaplain to his royal highness. In 1864 he was chosen to succeed Archbishop Trench in the deanery of Westminster. In theology, as well as in church politics, he was a zealous follower of the late Dr. Arnold. Of that great ornament to the established church he had always been a disciple; he preached his funeral sermon in 1842, at Rugby, and in 1844 produced a lasting memorial of his worth in the "Life and Correspondence of Thomas Arnold, D.D." Dean Stanley also produced a "Memoir" of his father, the bishop of Norwich; "Historical Memorials of Canterbury;" and an important work, entitled "Sinai and Palestine in connexion with their History." Several collections of sermons and essays also emanated from him. b. at Alderley, Cheshire, 1815.

STANLEY, Edward Henry Smith, Lord, a modern English statesman, became 15th Earl of Derby, 1869. On leaving the university of Cambridge, he went on a course of travel through the United States, Canada, and the West Indies. At a later period he visited India, whence he was recalled to undertake, in 1852, the duties of under-secretary of state for Foreign Affairs, in the administration of his father. When Lord Derby again formed a cabinet, in 1858, Lord Stanley became president of the Board of Control, or, more properly, secretary of state for India, the former title being abolished. In Lord Derby's third administration in 1866, he held the post of secretary of state for foreign affairs, by the management of which he gained the respect of all parties. b. at Knowsley, 1826.

STANYNURST, Richard, stai-ne-hurst, an Irish Roman Catholic divine, who was educated at University College, Oxford; after which he went abroad, and became chaplain to the archduke Albert, governor of the Netherlands. He wrote, among other works, in Latin, "The Life of St. Patrick;" and made an English translation of the first four books of the "Æneid." He was uncle to Archbishop Usher. b. at Dublin, 1545; d. at Brussels, 1618.

STAPEL, John Bodæus, stai-pel, an eminent Dutch physician and botanist, who devoted his life to the researches necessary for producing a complete edition of the botanical writings of Theophrastus. His death took place before he could complete his task; but some of his materials were used by his father, in the edition of Theophrastus published at Amsterdam in 1644. d. 1636.

STAPLEDON, Walter, stai-pel-don, an English prelate, who was educated at Oxford. His merits recommended him to the court, and he was made bishop of Exeter and treasurer of England. He founded Exeter College, Oxford, and was beheaded by the insurgents of London, at the cross in Cheapside, in 1328.

STAPLETON, Thomas, stai-pel-ton, an English Roman Catholic divine, who obtained, in the reign of Mary, a canonry in Chichester cathedral; but in that of Elizabeth went abroad, and settled at Louvain, where he was appointed professor in divinity. His works, chiefly upon theology, were published at Paris in 1620. d. 1598.

STAPELTON, Sir Robert, an English poet, who became gentleman usher to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. He received the honour of knighthood from Charles I., and was with him at the battle of Edgehill. After the Restoration his services were rewarded. He published a translation of "Juvenal," and some plays. p. 1669.

STATIUS, Publius Papinius, stai'-shi-us, a Roman poet, who became the favourite of Domitian. There remain of Statius two heroic poems—"Thebais," in 12 books, and the "Achilleis"—and "Sylva," a collection of short poems on passing events. p. at Naples, 61; p. 196.

STAUNTON, Sir George Leonard, stawn'-ton, an eminent Irish physician and diplomatist, studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree; after which he settled in London, where he became the friend of Dr. Johnson. About 1763 he went to Granada, where he practised as physician, and acquired a fortune. He also became secretary to Lord Macartney, governor of the island; and, having studied the law, he discharged the office of attorney-general. On the capture of Granada by the French, he was made prisoner, and with Lord Macartney, sent to France; but after some time returned to England. When Lord Macartney was appointed governor of Madras, he accompanied him as confidential secretary, in which capacity he displayed great abilities in the treaty with Tippoo Sultan in 1781. On his return to England he received a pension from the East India Company, besides which he was created a baronet. In 1793 Lord Macartney went out as ambassador to China, and was accompanied by Sir George as secretary of legation. Of this voyage he published an elaborate and highly interesting account. He was interred in Westminster Abbey, where there is a fine monument to his memory by Chantrey. p. in Galway, Ireland, 1737; p. in London, 1801.

STAUNTON, Sir George Thomas, a modern English writer, who was the son of the preceding, whom he accompanied to China in 1792. On his return to England, he was entered at the university of Cambridge, where he pursued his studies in a distinguished manner. On leaving the university, he went out to China as secretary of the English factory at Canton, of which trading community he subsequently became president. In 1816 he was attached to the embassy of Lord Amherst, in which capacity his knowledge of the Chinese character and language enabled him to render great services to the English government. In 1817 he quitted the East, and thenceforth devoted himself to politics, employing his leisure in the composition of a number of valuable works. The most important of these were, "The Penal Code of the Chinese Empire;" "Narrative of the Chinese Embassy to the Tartars in 1712-15;" "Journal of the Embassy of Lord Amherst;" "Memoirs of the Life and Family of the late Sir George Leonard Staunton;" and a translation from the Spanish of Mendoza, of a work entitled "History of the Great and Mighty Kingdom of China." His last work was undertaken for the Hakluyt Society. With a few short interruptions, Sir George sat in the House of Commons from 1818 until 1852. At the latter date he retired into private life. He was among the most distinguished of Chinese scholars; and so great were his acquirements in that exceedingly difficult language, that he was enabled to compose in it a treatise upon vaccination, which led to the introduction of that preventive into many parts of China. p. at Salisbury, 1781; p. 1859.

Steele

STAEFIZ, John, stae'-pitz, dean of the faculty of theology at Wittenberg, and vicar-general of the Augustines in Germany. It was he who charged Luther to defend his order against the Dominicans. p. 1527.

STAVELEY, Thomas, stair'-le, a learned English lawyer and antiquary, was the author of a work entitled "The Romish Horse-Lench, or a Discovery of the Enormous Exactions of the Court of Rome," and of the "History of Churches." p. in London, 1653.

STAY, Benedict, stai, a modern Latin poet, who produced a fine poem in that language, upon the philosophy of Descartes. He became secretary to Pope Clement XII. His finest production was a Latin poem upon the Newtonian philosophy. p. 1714; p. at Rome, 1801.

STAYNER, Sir Richard, stai'-ner, an English naval commander, who, in 1656, attacked a Spanish flotilla of eight sail, although his own force consisted of only three frigates. Two of the Spanish ships were captured, the remainder being either sunk or driven on shore. He returned with treasure to the amount of £600,000. Under Blake, he in 1657 led the attack upon the Spanish fleet in the Bay of Santa Cruz, and for his distinguished gallantry upon that memorable occasion, was made a knight by Cromwell. (See BLAKE.) After the Restoration, his knighthood was confirmed, and he was named rear-admiral of the fleet. He remained at sea during the rest of his life, although no occasion offered for the exercise of his skill and bravery as a seaman. After his death, at sea, his body was brought home and interred in London. Pepys, in his "Diary," records this last event as follows:—"By ten o'clock to Ironmongers' Hall, to the funeral of Sir Richard Stayner." p. 1662.

STEELE, Henry, stee'-ling, a learned English divine, who distinguished himself in the Jangorian controversy against Hoadley, and afterwards attacked Warburton's "Divine Legation." He became chancellor of the diocese of Salisbury. His other works are, "Sermons on Practical Christianity," and "Sermons on Boyle's Lectures." p. 1763.

STEELE, Sir Richard, steel, a celebrated essayist, whose father, a barrister, acted in the capacity of private secretary to the duke of Ormond. Richard received his education at the Charter-house, in London, and at Merton College, Oxford, after which he obtained an ensigncy in the Guards. In 1702 he commenced his career as a dramatic writer with the production of his comedy of "The Funeral, or Grief à la Mode," which had great success. This play was followed by the "Tender Husband" and the "Lying Lovers;" but his best work was the "Conscious Lovers," acted in 1722. In 1709 he began "The Tatler," a periodical paper, in which he had the assistance of Addison, as he also had in the "Spectator" and "Guardian;" the first commenced in 1711 and the last in 1713. His reputation as a writer procured him the place of commissioner of the stamp-office, which he resigned on being chosen member for Stockbridge. For writing two pamphlets, called the "Englishman" and the "Crisis," he was soon afterwards expelled the House of Commons, "which," says Lord Mahon, "was a fierce and most unwarrantable stretch of party violence." After the accession of George I. in 1715, Steele received the honour of knighthood, was appointed surveyor of the stable at Hampton Court, and governor of the royal company of comedians. He was also returned to Parliament for Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire, and made one of the commissioners of the forfeited estates in Scotland. A distinguished critic observes of Sir Richard Steele, that he was a "man of undissembled and extensive benevolence. . . His works are chaste and manly. He was a stranger to the most distant appearance of envy or malevolence; never jealous of any man's growing reputation, and so far from arrogating any praise to himself from his conjunction with Mr. Addison, that he was the first who desired him to distinguish his papers. His great fault was want of economy; and it has been said of him, he was certainly the most agreeable and the most innocent rake that entered the rounds of dissipation." b. at Dublin, 1671; d. near Carmarthen, 1729.

STEEL, JOHN, E.S.A., an eminent Scottish sculptor, son of a carver and gilder in Edinburgh, studied in the Academy there, and at Rome. In 1830, on his return from "the Eternal City," he distinguished himself by a colossal model of Alexander and Bucephalus. His sitting statue of Sir Walter Scott, in grey Carrara marble, under the lower ground arch of the picturesque and elegant monument to the great novelist at Edinburgh, procured for him the notice and support of the principal patrons of art in Scotland. A public competition took place for this statue, and his model was unanimously selected from among numerous others. His two principal works in Edinburgh are the fine sitting colossal figure of the Queen, in her royal robes, with orb and sceptre, above the Royal Institution, and the equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington, erected in 1852, in front of the Register House. The latter is one of the most striking of the many similar monuments to the great Duke that have been erected throughout the empire. The bust so pleased his Grace, that he paid the artist the high compliment of ordering two to be executed for him, one for Apsley House, and the other for Eton or Oxford. Mr. Steel's statue of Admiral Lord de Saumarez, in the Hall of Greenwich Hospital, is also much admired. b. 1804.

STEEN, Jan, stain, a celebrated Dutch painter. "In spirit, humour, and invention," says Dr. Waagen, "Steen excels all other Dutch painters in the line." n. at Levd 1636; d. 1689.

STEENWYX, Henry, stain'-vike, a Flemish painter, who excelled in depicting architectural subjects, or the insides of churches and Gothic buildings. b. 1550; d. at Frankfort, 1604.

STEEVENS, George, ste'-vens, an English writer, and one of the editors of Shakspeare. In 1768 he published twenty of the plays of Shakspeare, with notes. This work produced an intimacy between Steevens and Dr. Johnson, the result of which was a union of their labours as editors and commentators of Shakspeare. Their edition appeared in 1773. Twenty years afterwards, Steevens published a still more accurate edition of the great English dramatist, in 15 vols. He also revised the proofs of Boydell's edition of Shakspeare. b. at Stepney, 1736; d. at Hampstead, 1800.

STEFFANI, Agostino, steff'-fa'-ne, a celebrated Italian composer, who was at first a chorister at St. Mark's, Venice, where he attracted the notice of a German nobleman by the beauty of his voice. This patron provided him with the means of obtaining a learned and musical education. He entered into holy orders, but chiefly devoted himself to musical composition. The duke of Brunswick, father of George I., offered him the posts of director of his chamber music and of the opera, which Steffani accepted. He composed several operas, and a large number of madrigals, motets, duets, &c. Caroline, Consort of George II., edited a hundred of his duets. He subsequently became bishop of Spiga, having in 1708 resigned his posts under the elector of Hanover to Handel. b. about 1655; d. at Frankfort, 1730.

STEFFENS, Henry, steff'-fens, an eminent philosopher, who studied at the university of Copenhagen, where he so highly distinguished himself as to gain, in 1794, a travelling prize. In 1796 he was engaged as a lecturer upon natural history, and also as private tutor at Hamburg; in 1800 he was appointed to make a revision of Schelling's works upon natural philosophy; at a later period he was appointed assistant to the professor of philosophy in the university of Jena. After spending a short time in Denmark, he in 1804 became professor in the university at Halle. In 1809 he joined the Prussian volunteers, with whom he fought till they entered Paris in 1813. Afterwards he held the professorship of physics and natural history at Breslau, and from the year 1831 until his death, at the university of Berlin. The most important works of this learned writer were, his "Autobiography;" "On the False Theology and the True Faith;" "Polemical Leaves for the Advancement of Speculative Physics;" some novels; and the "Fundamental Features of Philosophical Natural Science." b. at Stavanger, Norway, 1773; d. at Berlin, 1845.

STREIBEL, Daniel, stt'-bell, an eminent German composer, who having been fortunate enough to attract the notice of William III. of Prussia, was educated at the charge of that king. He resided for a long time in London, where he produced a large number of compositions for the pianoforte, upon which instrument he was a most brilliant performer. In Paris he was the first to introduce Haydn's "Creation." He subsequently became chapel-master to the emperor of Russia; and while a resident at St. Petersburg, produced several operas. b. at Berlin, 1765; d. at St. Petersburg, 1823.

STEIN, Frederick Charles, Baron von, stine, a celebrated Prussian statesman, who commenced his public life in 1779 as director of mines. After fulfilling the duties of various official appointments during the lifetime of Frederick the Great, he in 1786 paid a visit to England, where he made a profound study of the constitution of Great Britain. Under Frederick William III., he was the prime mover of those measures by which Prussia, although shorn of more than half her territory, was enabled to re-establish herself as a great kingdom, and afterwards to contribute to the downfall of Napoleon I. He introduced into Prussia a municipal system, trained the youth of the kingdom in the use of arms, reorganized the army—in short, he introduced a complete change of system throughout the whole Prussian government, whether of politics or of administration. Napoleon having learned what "one Stein" was doing, obliged him, in 1803, to relinquish his post, and to take refuge first in Austria, and afterwards in Russia, where he became counsellor to Alexander I. leon, Stein, finding his views too liberal for Prussia, retired into private life. n. at Nassau, 1757; p. 913.

STENO, Nicholas, star-no, an eminent Danish anatomist, who became principal physician to Ferdinand II., grand-duke of Tuscany. He was also appointed tutor to the young Prince Cosmo, and, embracing the ecclesiastical state, was made a bishop by the pope, who sent him, with the title of vicar-apostolic, to Germany. His most important works were, "Discourse on the Anatomy of the Brain," and a treatise on the "Muscles and Glands." n. at Copenhagen, 1633; p. at Schwerin, Mecklenburg, 1677.

STEPHEN OF BYZANTIUM, ste'-fen, a Greek grammarian and lexicographer, who wrote a geographical dictionary, probably the first ever produced, of which there remains an abridgment, made by Hermolaus, in the reign of Justinian. Flourished about the 6th century.

STEPHEN I., Pope, ascended the pontifical chair after Lucius, in 253. He had a difference with St. Cyprian and Firmilian about rehabilitating repentant heretics, which practice this pope condemned. p. 237.

STEPHEN II., elected in 752, died three days after his election.

STEPHEN III. was a native of Rome, and elected pope in 752. Astolphus, king of the Lombards, having menaced the city of Rome, Stephen implored the aid of Constantine Copronymus, emperor of the East; but he, being engaged in a war, recommended the pope's cause to Pepin, king of the Franks, who marched into Italy, and deprived Astolphus of the exarchate of Ravenna and several cities, which he gave to the pope, thus founding the temporal sovereignty of the church of Rome. p. 757.

STEPHEN IV. succeeded Paul I. in 768. Throughout his career he was at variance with the Lombards, and threatened to excommunicate Charles (afterwards Charlemagne) and Carloman, sons of Pepin, if they entered into an alliance with them, or intermarried with the daughters of the Lombard king. Charles, however, married Hermengarda, daughter of Desiderius, king of the Lombards, but put her away a year afterwards. Stephen was succeeded by Adrian I. p. 772.

STEPHEN V. succeeded Leo III. in 816, but died in the same year.

STEPHEN VI. was elected in succession to Adrian III. in 885. He was a learned pontiff, and greatly contributed to relieve the people of Rome from the effects of a terrible famine which had desolated the country shortly before his accession. p. 891.

STEPHEN VII. became pope in succession to Benedict VI. in 896. He caused the body of Pope Formosus to be disinterred and cast into an ordinary grave, on the plea that the pope had been excommunicated by John VII. anterior to his elevation to the tiara. In 897 the partisans of Formosus burst into an insurrection, and, having seized Stephen, strangled him.

STEPHEN VIII. was the successor of Leo VI., and was elevated to the papacy in 829. There are no reliable records of his pontificate. p. 930.

STEPHEN IX. was the successor of Leo VII. At the time of his election, 939, Rome was governed by Alberic, son of Marozia (see MAROZIA), who styled himself "prince and senator of all the Romans." The records of the papacy are extremely untrustworthy; but it is stated by one authority that Stephen IX. was, during a revolt of the Roman populace, rendered a cripple for life. His successor was Martin III. Stephen p. 943.

STEPHEN X. was elected to the papacy in succession to Victor II. in 1057. He had previously fulfilled the office of papal legate at the court of Constantinople. After his elevation, he dispatched legates to Milan, to enforce celibacy among the clergy of that church, the disputes upon which decree lasted during a quarter of a century. He summoned the learned Pylrus Damianus from his monastery, and created him cardinal and bishop of Ostia. It is surmised from several passages in his letters, that he intended to crown his brother, Godfrey duke of Tuscany, king of Italy. According to one of the bulls issued by him, the clergy were exempted from the jurisdiction of lay courts, as also from the payment of tribute to laymen. He was a learned and energetic pontiff, but too ambitious of worldly influence. p. 1063.

STEPHEN I., St., king of Hungary, succeeded his father Geisa in 997. He reformed the manners of his subjects, enacted excellent laws, and introduced Christianity into his kingdom. p. 1093.

STEPHEN II., king of Hungary, succeeded his father Koloman in 1114. He invaded Poland and Austria, and marched into Russia, but was unsuccessful everywhere. He abdicated in 1131, and retired to a monastery, where he died in the same year.

STEPHEN III. was crowned king of Hungary in 1161, but was almost immediately deposed by the nobles. He regained the crown, however, in 1165, and reigned till 1173.

STEPHEN IV. ascended the throne in 1161, but was defeated by the preceding in 1163, soon after which he died at Semlin.

STEPHEN V. reigned two years, 1270-72.

STEPHEN, king of England, was the third son of Stephen, earl of Blois, by Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror, and was crowned at Westminster in 1135. Matilda, daughter of Henry I., and wife of Henry IV., emperor of Germany, was the legitimate heir to the throne; but Stephen, taking advantage of her absence, obtained possession of it. In 1139 Matilda landed in England, and in 1141 took Stephen prisoner at the battle of Lincoln; but he was exchanged the same year for Robert, earl of Gloucester, illegitimate brother of the empress. Matilda, after many unsuccessful engagements, quitted the kingdom in 1147, and, two years subsequently, her son Henry, by Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, claimed the crown; but in 1153 a peace was concluded between the rivals, by which it was settled that Stephen should enjoy the crown for life, and that Henry should be his successor. p. 1105; p. 1154.

STEPHEN BATHORI, king of Poland, and the greatest monarch of that country, was descended of a noble Hungarian family, and having, through the exercise of great talent and bravery, won the throne of Transylvania in 1571, he was, four years subsequently, elected king of Poland. He married the sister of Sigismund Augustus, and occupied the first years of his reign in improving the internal condition of the country. Having secured the alliance of the Turks, he resolved to turn his arms against the powerful Ivan Vasilovitch, of Muscovy, who had invaded Livonia. He next organized the Cossacks of the Ukraine, repaired and garrisoned the Polish frontier fortresses, and enlisted some German and Hungarian mercenaries, with whom, and a large force of Poles, he took the field. He defeated the Muscovites in several desperate engagements, and took the important town of Polotzk, which had been wrested from the Poles some time previously. Bathori's victorious career was arrested by the intrigues of the Jesuit Possevinus with Ivan, who, promising to acknowledge the supremacy of Pope Sixtus V., induced the Polish king to suspend hostilities; but, when Bathori discovered that Ivan did not intend to make this alteration with regard to the church of his country, hostilities were recommenced. This second campaign was, however, brought to a sudden termination by the death of Bathori. He was not only a successful soldier, but a wise and provident administrator, as was evinced by the great number of improvements which he introduced into the civil government of Poland. A liberal patron of learning, he founded the university of Wilna and the college of Polotzk. B. in Hungary, 1533; d. at Grodno, 1586.

STEPHEN, Right Hon. Sir James, a modern English lawyer, government official, and historian, was educated for the legal profession, and soon after entering upon practice, was chosen as counsel of the Colonial department. Having retired from the bar, he became assistant under-secretary for the colonies. At a later period he was promoted to the permanent under-secretaryship of the same department; but after spending thirty-five years in the civil service, he, in 1847, retired from it. His distinguished services were rewarded with a knighthood. In 1849 he was chosen regius professor of modern history in the university of Cambridge. His contributions to English literature are highly esteemed; the most important of them being, "Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography," and "Lectures on the History of France," b. about 1789; d. 1839.

STEPHEN, Sir George, a modern English writer, and brother of the preceding, is principally known by his work entitled "Adventures of a Gentleman in search of a Horse," a novel called "The Jesuit at Cambridge," and a pamphlet on "The Niger Trade, and the African Blockade," b. about 1800.

STEPHENS, in French ETIENNE or ESTIENNE, in Latin STEPHANUS, the name of an illustrious family of learned printers, the most distinguished members of which were:—

STEPHENS, Henry. He chiefly printed works on mathematical, medical, and philosophical subjects, but also produced a few editions of classical writers. His widow married Simon de Colines, the celebrated printer, who carried on the business till his death in 1547. Stephens was b. at Paris, about 1460; d. about 1522.

STEPHENS, Robert, son of the preceding, received a learned education, which included the Greek, Latin, and Hebrew languages, and conducted the business with Colines. In 1539 he was appointed printer to Francis I.; subsequently to whose death, in 1547, he retired to Geneva. He had given offence to the Sorbonne, by printing a Latin Bible with the notes of Calvin, and therefore did not deem himself safe in France. He was so exact in printing the works which issued from his press, as to expose the sheets for public examination, offering rewards for the detection of errors. His Hebrew Bible and Greek Testament are very scarce and valuable. Stephens compiled a great work, entitled "Thesaurus Lingue Latine," and wrote an apology, in Latin, for his Bible, which had been censured by the Sorbonne. b. at Paris, 1503; d. at Geneva, 1559.

STEPHENS, Charles, brother of the preceding, studied medicine, and took his doctor's degree in that faculty. He accompanied Lazarus Baifus on his embassy from the court of France to Germany; but upon his return to Paris, and after his brother's removal to Geneva, he continued the family profession, and became printer to the king. During ten years he produced ninety-seven works, all of them beautiful specimens of typography. b. about 1504; d. 1564.

STEPHENS, Henry, the most distinguished of this learned family, was the son of Robert. He was accounted the best Grecian of his time, and published beautiful and correct editions of the best Greek writers. He also compiled a Thesaurus of the Greek language, the printing of which almost ruined him, for its sale was very small, owing to Scapula, his assistant, having surreptitiously made an abridgment of it, which he published (see SCAPULA). Besides these works, he was the author of a version of Anacreon, in Latin verse; "Corrections of Cicero," "Apology for Herodotus," &c. b. at Paris, 1523; d. at Lyons, 1598.

STEPHENS, Paul, son of the preceding, carried on the printing business at Geneva, and reprinted Virgil, Horace, and several other classical works. He disposed of his business in 1627. b. at Geneva, 1566; d. about 1628.

STEPHENS, Anthony, son of the preceding, and the last printer of his family, turned Roman Catholic, and went to Paris, where he became printer to the king; but managing his affairs ill, he was reduced to poverty, and died in an hospital at Paris, 1674.

STEPHENS, John, an English writer, who was a Roman Catholic, and a zealous adherent of the house of Stuart. James II. gave him a captain's commission. He published some works, the principal of which are, "A Continuation of Dugdale's Monasticon," and "A Dictionary, English and Spanish," b. 1728.

STEPHENS, Robert, a learned English antiquary, who was a lawyer by profession. He published Lord Bacon's Letters, with curious notes, and other works. b. 1732.

STEPHENS, James Francis, an eminent English entomologist, who was at first a clerk in the Admiralty Office; but, having exhibited considerable knowledge of natural history, was appointed to assist Dr. Leach, of the British Museum. He produced, "Illustrations of British Entomology," "A Manual of the British Coleoptera," and "Systematic Catalogue of British Insects." He was president of the Entomological, and Fellow of the Linnean Societies. b. at Shoreham, Sussex, 1792; d. in London, 1852.

STEPHENSON, George, ste'-fen-son, a distinguished English mechanician and the inventor of the locomotive, was the son of a fireman at a colliery, and while still a child was employed to herd cows. Even at that early age his genius for mechanical invention was foreshadowed in the amusements which he sought; it being his habit to sit in a bog modelling clay engines and constructing miniature windmills. In his fourteenth year he was appointed assistant fireman to his father. In another year he rose to be fireman. Constantly taking advantage of every spare moment to increase his knowledge of the machinery used in a colliery, he made so much progress, that by the time he had attained his seventeenth year, he had risen to the post of plugman. He had now the engine under his charge; it being his duty to keep it in proper working condition. Resolved to master every detail of its construction, he would frequently take the engine to pieces, in order to become acquainted with the working of all its parts. He was in receipt of the (to him large) sum of twelve shillings per week, and he formed the resolution to acquire some education. At a night-school at Walbottle, he learnt to read and write, and in 1799 paid fourpence per week to a Scotchman, at Newburn, to teach him arithmetic. In his twentieth year he married, and was appointed brakesman to an engine used in lifting the ballast brought by the collier ships on their return voyage to Newcastle. At this time he added to his income by devoting his leisure to boot-mending, cutting out the pitmen's clothes, and clock-cleaning; but, with all this, he found time for his experiments in mechanics. In 1803 his son Robert was born; soon after which, his wife died. In 1804 he proceeded to Montrose, having been appointed to superintend one of Messrs. Boulton and Watt's engines there. He remained in Scotland about a year; upon which he returned to his former employment at Killingworth. In 1812 he was appointed engineer of the colliery, at a salary of £100 per annum. This, the first great step in his career, was the result of the assiduous application he had bestowed upon a mastery of the principles of mechanism, by which he had been enabled to suggest many improvements in machinery to his employers. The turning-point of his career was now at hand. The construction of a locomotive engine had long been a favourite problem with engineers connected with colliery labour. Several travelling engines had, indeed, been constructed, but they were at best only clumsy and inefficient pieces of machinery. To this great task Stephenson now bent his mind, and brought to bear upon his self-imposed undertaking all those stores of mechanical knowledge which, under the most disadvantageous circumstances, he had collected. He inspected all the locomotives within his reach, and at length informed one of his employers, Lord Ravensworth, that he could make a better engine for the colliery tramways than any yet seen. He was provided with the means of executing his design, and in less than a year completed a travelling engine which drew along the colliery tramroad eight loaded carriages, weighing thirty tons, at a rate of four miles an hour. This successful trial took place in 1814. The engine was, nevertheless, but an imperfect and cumbersome affair, although no one saw its defects save George Stephenson himself. In the following year he constructed another engine, which was a vast improvement upon its predecessor. He next invented a safety-lamp, which, upon completion, proved to be in principle similar to that produced at the same period by Sir Humphry Davy. A controversy was raised as to who was, in reality, the inventor; but, after a full review of all the facts, it would appear that both Sir Humphry Davy and Stephenson had produced a lamp identical in principle, but totally independent of each other. Stephenson went on adding improvement after improvement to his travelling engine, and also bestowed great attention upon the tramroad, which he made of a more level and substantial character. His object had hitherto been merely to provide a good tramroad, with an efficient and economical substitute for horse-power, in the shape of a travelling engine to work upon it, for the conveyance of the coal from the pit's mouth to the Tyne-side. But the time was fast approaching when his improved tramroads and his travelling engine (soon to be named the Locomotive) were to play a still more important part. In 1825, Mr. Pease, of Darlington, obtained an act of Parliament for the construction of a railway to be worked "with men and horses or otherwise." Meanwhile, Stephenson had converted the tramroad of the Hetton Colliery into a railway eight miles in extent. This fact recommended him to the notice of Mr. Pease, who caused him to be engaged as the engineer of the new undertaking, which, under the name of the Stockton and Darlington Railway, was finished in 1825. About the same time, Stephenson was engaged to make a survey for a proposed railway or tramroad between Manchester and Liverpool. In Parliament the most absurd objections to the scheme were raised; and even when the act was passed, the persons employed in making the survey had literally to fight for permission to do so. Nothing less than genius of the highest order, combined with indomitable perseverance, could have triumphed over the difficulties which presented themselves to George Stephenson in the construction of the railway between Liverpool and Manchester. He had to make a firm bed for his locomotives and passenger-carriages through Chat Moss, a spongy bog; he had to overcome the supineness of directors—to prevail upon them to at least make a trial of the locomotive before they decided upon employing horse-traction, as most of them were inclined to do. He had to invent the whole system of railway labour,—its signals, "navvies," rails, stations, and locomotives. The entire scheme was at first regarded as a subject only fit to be ridiculed, by some of the most eminent scientific men in England. Very few of the regularly-educated civil engineers had any faith in the project. In point of fact, this, the first railway of any importance ever constructed, was a gigantic innovation, and none but a powerful and original-minded genius, such as the self-educated colliery fireman was, could have carried it to completion. In the progress of this work, George Stephenson availed himself of the valuable services of his son Robert, whom he had caused to be carefully and thoroughly educated as a civil engineer. Some years antecedent to the completion of the Manchester and Liverpool line of railway, he had, with great foresight, set up a factory for the construction of locomotives; and when the demand for these engines was created, it was found that from his establishment alone could anything like a perfect machine be obtained. The company had offered a prize of £500 for a locomotive engine to be used on the new line. By the specified time, several engines were put forward; but all broke down upon their first trial, except the "Rocket," which had been turned out from Stephenson's factory. It must, however, be admitted that the success of this locomotive was mainly owing to its "multitubular boiler," which had been suggested by Mr. Henry Booth, and manufactured under the personal superintendence of the younger Stephenson.

Stephenson

On September 15th, 1830, the Liverpool and Manchester line was opened; and from that moment George Stephenson was acknowledged as one of the most distinguished men of his time. Lines of railway were projected throughout the kingdom, and Stephenson was appointed chief engineer of some of the most important. For a long time he enjoyed the monopoly of locomotive-making; and it was not until skilled workmen, trained in his factory, had been called away to form or superintend other establishments, that a good engine could be obtained in any other quarter. He was also engaged upon some foreign lines, principally in Belgium. He went to Spain to make the survey of a proposed line between Madrid and the Pyrenees; but the scheme was subsequently abandoned. In 1845 he relinquished nearly all his engagements with railway companies, and devoted his attention to the collieries and lime-works of which he had become the proprietor, his leisure being amused with his farm and gardens. It was in these occupations that the great English engineer spent the few years which were left to him after quitting that career of high-minded industry in which he won fame and fortune for himself, and conferred a lasting boon on mankind. b. at Wylam, Northumberland, 1781; d. 1848.

STEPHENSON, Robert, a distinguished English civil engineer, was the son and only child of the preceding. From the outset his father was resolved to give him the best education it was in his power to pay for. Robert, in his eleventh year, was sent to school at Newcastle; and, having very early evinced a predilection for mechanics and science generally, he joined the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Institution; and when he came home for his Saturday half-holiday, was always provided with a book from the library. Long afterwards, when the father had become an eminent engineer, he would proudly allude to the studies pursued by himself and his son, assisted by a volume upon a scientific subject, brought home by the latter. In 1818 his father was in a position to apprentice him to Mr. Nicholas Wood, as a coal-viewer. Under that gentleman, Robert obtained a complete knowledge of the machinery used in a colliery; in 1820 he repaired for a session to the university of Edinburgh, where he attended the lectures of Sir John Leslie and Professor Jamieson upon natural philosophy, geology, and mineralogy. During his stay there he gained a mathematical prize; and, after returning home, was apprenticed to his father, who had just commenced his locomotive factory at Newcastle. In consequence of his health having become delicate, he in 1824 went out to South America upon a commission to examine the gold and silver mines of that country. George Stephenson, on being appointed engineer to the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, recalled his son, who reached England at the close of 1827. He then became one of the chief assistants to his father, and after rendering him material services, he, upon the completion of the Liverpool line, was engaged to form a branch of the same, near Warrington. He next made the survey for the Leicester and Swannington Railway, and afterwards of the London and Birmingham line, of which he was subsequently appointed engineer. Employment of the highest kind was now profusely offered to him, and he soon displayed a vastness and grandeur of conception in his designs which made him remarkable among his contemporaries. The High Level Bridge over the Tyne, at Newcastle; the Viaduct over the valley of the Tweed, at Berwick; the Britannia Bridge, over the Menai Strait; and the Victoria Bridge, over the St. Lawrence, at Montreal, are magnificent proofs of the boldness and originality of his genius for triumphing over material obstacles. He assisted his father in the laying-out of the lines in Belgium; constructed a railway between Alexandria and Cairo, and designed an immense bridge to cross the Nile. In 1847 he was elected member of Parliament for Whitby, in Yorkshire, which place he represented during many years. The liberality of his disposition was evinced in several of his public acts. In 1855 he liquidated the liabilities, amounting to upwards of £3000, of the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Institution, in grateful remembrance of those early days when he was allowed to take home from its library a volume for himself and his father to peruse. He placed his magnificent yacht and its crew at the disposal of Mr. Piazzi Smyth, to enable that gentleman to carry out his proposed astronomical observations at the Peak of Teneriffe. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, president of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and a member of many learned and scientific bodies both English and continental. He was the author of two valuable works, entitled, respectively, "The Locomotive Steam-engine," and "The Atmospheric Railway System." As his father may be called the founder of the great school of English railway engineering, so may the son be termed its brightest ornament. b. at Willington, 1803; d. in London, 1859.

STEPHENS, George, step'-ne, an English poet, who came of an ancient Pembrokeshire family, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. On leaving the university he found a patron in the earl of Dorset, who obtained for him several public employments. He was successively engaged as envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, the emperor of Germany, the elector of Saxony, and to the States-general. In 1697 he was appointed one of the commissioners of trade. He assisted Dryden in making the translation of Juvenal. Dr. Johnson declares that he "was a very licentious translator, and did not recompense the neglect of his author by treasures of his own." b. in London, 1663; d. at Chelsea, 1707.

STERLING, John, ster'-ling, a modern English essayist, who was the son of Edward Sterling, a famous editor of the "Times" newspaper. After spending some time at the university of Glasgow, he was in 1824 sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had Dr., afterwards Archdeacon Hare, for his tutor, and became acquainted with a knot of brilliant young men, numbering, amongst others, Frederick Maurice, Richard Trench, Monckton Milnes, and Charles Buller. After leaving Cambridge, he purchased the "Athenæum" newspaper of its projector, Mr. Silk Buckingham; but, the speculation not proving successful, the print was disposed of to Mr. Dilke. In 1834 he entered into holy orders, and became curate of Hurstmonceaux, in Sussex, under his friend Archdeacon Hare. The delicate state of his health compelled him to vacate this office in less than a year afterwards; and henceforth his life was spent in migrations between England and other countries enjoying a warmer climate. The peculiarly intellectual qualities of his character endeared him to a circle including the most distinguished literary men of his day; and, after his death, a very affectionate biography, of which he was the subject, was written by Mr. Carlyle. His most disposed of his lectures to Lee Lewis. He wrote some farces, songs, and a novel called "Tom Fool." b. in London, about 1720; d. at Biggleswade, Bedfordshire, 1754.

STEVENS, John Hall, ste'-ven'-son, a humorous poet and satirist, was born in Yorkshire, educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, and became intimate English novelist, who received his education at Halifax, Yorkshire; whence he was sent to Jesus College, Cambridge, and, having taken his degrees, entered into orders. His uncle, Dr. Jacques Sterne, prebendary of Durham, procured him the living of Sutton, and, about 1741, a prebend in York Cathedral. He afterwards obtained the rectory of Stillington, in the same county. He published the first two volumes of "Tristram Shandy" at York in 1759. On the republication of these in London, the year following, Sterne, from obscurity, rose to the height of literary fame. During the subsequent twenty-eight years, he produced the conclusion of his first novel; a "Sentimental Journey in France;" some sermons under the name of "Yorick;" and "Letters." Twenty years after his death, Dr. Ferriar published a work, professing to point out the sources of Sterne's wit and humour; but, although he succeeds in proving that Sterne has borrowed greatly from "Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy," &c., it cannot be allowed that Sterne's beauties are drawn from extraneous sources. As Sterne himself observed, "Every man's wit must come from every man's own soul, and no other body's." b. at Clonmel, Ireland, 1713; d. in London, 1768.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, stern'-hold, an English poet, who became successively groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He produced a metrical version of fifty-one of David's Psalms: the remainder were done by Hopkins, Norton, and others. He also wrote "Certain Chapters of the Proverbs of Solomon drawn into Metre." The first complete version of the Psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins was published in 1562. b. in Hampshire; d. 1549.

STESICHRUS, ste-sik'-o'-rus, an ancient Greek poet. His name, according to Suidas, was originally Tisias, which he changed to Stesichorus, on account of his being the first who taught the chorus to dance to the lyre. He was man of the first rank among his fellow-citizens, and was distinguished as a statesman. Fragments of his works were published by Kleine, at Berlin, 1823. b. at Himera, in Sicily, about 643, b.c.; d. in Sicily, about 560 b.c.

STEWART, Sir James, stew'-art, a Scotch writer upon political economy. He published, among other works, one in French, called "Vindication of Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology," and another on Political Economy. This contains much valuable information, but is written in a perplexed and tedious style. It preceded the great work of Adam Smith by about nine years. b. at Edinburgh, 1712; d. 1780.

STEVENS, George Alexander, ste'-vens, an English dramatic writer and performer. He composed a strange medley of humour and ribaldry, called a "Lecture on Heads," by which he realized above £10,000. After travelling over the three kingdoms and America, he STEVENS, Sir John Andrew, an eminent musical composer, was a native of Dublin, and at 10 years of age was received into the choir-school of Christchurch, where he obtained the elements of a musical education, and soon gave promise of those powers for which he was afterwards celebrated. In connexion with the poet Moore, he rescued the beautiful airs of Ireland from oblivion, by adapting them to the words of the "Irish Melodies," and enriching the accompaniments with the graces of modern science. He also produced an oratorio entitled "The Thanksgiving," and a variety of anthems, glees, &c. b. 1761; d. 1801.

STEVENS, Robert, an eminent Scottish engineer, who was placed as assistant with Mr. Thomas Smith, of Edinburgh, engineer to the Northern Lighthouse-commissioners; in which appointment he succeeded his tutor in 1797. In 1807 he commenced the construction of the celebrated Bell-Rock lighthouse, off Arbroath, in Forfarshire. While upon a tour of inspection in 1814, he was accompanied by Sir Walter Scott, who obtained during the voyage materials for his poem, "The Lord of the Isles," and novel of "The Pirate." Besides erecting twenty-three lighthouses, he was engaged in designing many improvements in harbours, and in the construction of several bridges, chiefly in Scotland. b. at Glasgow, 1772; d. 1850.

STEWART, Matthew, stew'-art, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who studied divinity at Glasgow, and afterwards mathematics at Edinburgh under Maclaurin, whom in 1747 he succeeded in his professorship; on which occasion he published his "General Theorems." In 1761 appeared his tracts, physical and mathematical, in which he proposed to deduce a theory of the moon, and to determine the sun's distance from the earth. He was also the author of a treatise on the sun's distance, and other works chiefly mathematical. b. at Rothsay, Isle of Bute, 1717; d. 1785.

STEWART, Dugald, a distinguished Scotch metaphysician, and son of the preceding, received his education at the High School of Edinburgh and the university of Glasgow. His great attainments as a speculator in metaphysical inquiry were evinced as early as his 18th year, when he produced an essay on "Dreaming." His mathematical attainments also were so great, that, on reaching his 21st year, he was selected to fulfil the functions of assistant mathematical professor to his father in the university of Edinburgh. After officiating for some time as the deputy of Dr. Ferguson, he was, in 1785, appointed to succeed that learned professor in the chair of moral philosophy. In this position his name became famous throughout Great Britain, and his classes were attended by the most brilliant and promising young men of the time. "Without derogation from his writings," says Sir James Mackintosh, "it may be said that his disciples were among his best works." In 1792 he produced the first volume of his "Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind;" and, in the succeeding year, his "Outlines of Moral Philosophy." During the nine or ten subsequent years, he put forth a "Life of Dr. Robertson," a "Life of Dr. Reid," "Lectures on Political Economy," and the "Life of Adam Smith." The first volume of his celebrated "Philosophical Essays" appeared in 1810. In this work, according to Sir James Mackintosh, he appeared to the greatest advantage as a metaphysician. The volume contained essays upon Locke, Berkeley, Influence of Locke on the Philosophy of France, Metaphysical theories of Hartley, Priestley, and Darwin, on Philosophical Speculations, on the Beautiful, Sublime, Taste, and Culture of Intellectual Habits. His last works were, "View of the Active and Moral Powers," and the celebrated "General View of the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Science since the Revival of Letters," which appeared in 1815, as the "Preliminary Dissertation to the Supplement of the Encyclopædia Britannica." It is true Stewart was but the follower of Reid, the great Scotch metaphysician; but he cleared away the confusion and objectionable parts of that philosopher's doctrines. b. at Edinburgh, 1753; d. near the same city, 1829.

STIEGLITZ, Christian Louis, sté'-glitz, an eminent German writer upon architectural art, who was educated for and practised the profession of law throughout his life, but devoted his leisure to the composition of learned treatises upon art, chiefly respecting architecture. His most important works were, "Encyclopædia of Civil Architecture," "Ancient or Mediæval German Art," a "Compendium of the History of Architecture from the Earliest Periods," and an essay on medals and collections of coins. b. at Leipzig, 1756; d. 1836.

STIGAND, stig'-and, a Saxon prelate, who was a favourite with Edward the Confessor, who created him bishop of the East Angles. In 1052 he became archbishop of Canterbury. Subsequently, William the Conqueror refused to be crowned by him, and, finally, degraded him from his high offices and threw him into prison, where he is said to have been starved to death. His successor was Lanfranc.

STIGLMAYER, John Baptist, stigl'-mä-er, an eminent Bavarian sculptor, and director of the bronze-foundry of Munich, was the son of a blacksmith, but in early life evinced so great an aptitude for design, that he found patrons, who had him regularly educated for the sculptor's art. At a subsequent period he directed his attention to metal-founding; and after increasing his knowledge by sojourning at Naples and Berlin, he returned to Munich, and there undertook the casting of those celebrated bronze statues, after the models of Thorwaldsen, Schwanthaler, Rauch, and himself, which adorn the city of Munich and its environs. He was succeeded in the directorship of the royal foundry by Ferdinand Miller, his nephew. b. at Munich, 1791; d. 1844.

STILICHO, Flavius, stil'-i-ko, general and favourite of the emperor Theodosius, whose niece and adopted daughter he espoused. After discharging, among other high offices, that of ambassador and master-general of all the forces of the Western empire, he, upon the death of Theodosius, in 395, became guardian of his son Honorius, who had been left the empire of the West, as his elder brother Arcadius had received that of the East. Stilicho appears to have aspired to the command of both the Eastern and Western armies; but in this design he was thwarted by Rufinus, tutor to Arcadius, who reigned at Constantinople. Stilicho, however, caused Rufinus to be slain, and afterwards married his daughter to Honorius. A general of the highest ability and bravery, he on several occasions prevented the empire from being devastated by Alaric and his barbarians. In 408 Honorius was induced to believe that Stilicho intended to depose him, and place his own son, Eucherius, upon the throne. Honorius accordingly ordered him to be put to death, which was done by Count Heraclian, at Ravenna, in the same year.

STILL, John, stil, an English prelate, who in 1592 was elevated to the bishopric of Bath and Wells. "He was," says Fuller, "no less famous for a preacher than a disputant." He is stated to have written, while a young man, a play called "Gammer Gurton's Needle," one of the earliest comedies extant in the English language. The play is included in Dodsley's collection. b. 1543; d. 1607.

STILLING, Jung Johann Heinrich, stil'-ling, one of the most distinguished members of the sect of Pietists in Germany, was brought up to the business of a tailor, but exchanged it for the duties of tutor in a gentleman's family. Having saved some money, he proceeded to the university of Strasburg, and there studied medicine. Becoming acquainted with Göthe, who conceived a warm feeling of friendship towards him, he, at that poet's suggestion, composed his interesting autobiography. After practising as a physician at Eberfeld during several years, he was nominated to a professorship at Lautern, and in 1803 at Heidelberg. As a physician, he effected a large number of cures of diseases of the eye. "The great element of his character was an invincible and intense faith in God and an immediate providence ever at hand in the time of trouble, and which momentarily preserves man from evil." He produced some remarkable works; the most important of which were, "Seenes from the Kingdom of Spirits," "Theory of the Knowledge of Spirits," and "Method of Operating for Cataract." A complete edition of his writings was published at Leipzig in 1835. His "Autobiography" has been translated into English. b. at Gründ, Westphalia, 1740; d. at Carlsruhe, 1817.

STILLINGFLEET, Edward, stil'-ling-fleet, a learned English prelate, who was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow in 1653. In 1657 he was presented to the rectory of Sutton, by his friend Sir Roger Burgoyne, to whom he dedicated, in 1662, his great work, entitled "Origines Sacrae, or a Rational Account of the Grounds of Natural and Revealed Religion." In 1670 he was made canon-residentiary, and, in 1678, dean of St. Paul's. He wrote and preached with great ability against popery and the nonconformists during the reign of James II., and in 1689 was made bishop of Worcester. He was a man of profound learning, a close and energetic writer, and an excellent divine. All his works were collected in 6 volumes in 1710. b. at Cranbourn, Dorset, 1635; d. in London, 1699.

STILLINGFLEET, Benjamin, an English naturalist and poet, and grandson of the preceding, after studying at Cambridge, travelled upon the continent, and on his return to England devoted himself to literature. He wrote, "The Calendar of Flora;" "Miscellaneous Travels;" "The Principles and Powers of Harmony;" poems in Dodsley's collection, &c. b. 1702; d. in London, 1771.

STILPO, stil'-po, a distinguished philosopher of the Megarian school. Ptolemy Soter invited him to his court, but Stilpo refused. When Megara, the native place of the philosopher, was taken by Demetrius Poliorcetes, the conqueror ordered the house of Stilpo, "the wisest of all living Greeks," to be spared. He taught that perfect wisdom consisted in the complete mastery of the passions. None of his writings have survived. Flourished about 300 B.C.

STIRLING, James, stir'-ling, an English mathematician, who was educated at the university of Oxford, and became a fellow of the Royal Society. He produced some able expositions of the Newtonian philosophy. His most important works were, "On the Figure of the Earth, and upon the Variations of the Force of Gravity at its Surface;" "Methodus Differentialis;" and a number of papers upon the higher mathematics, which were inserted in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1735, and subsequently. Although highly esteemed by his contemporaries, scarcely anything is known respecting his life. b. towards the close of the 17th century. d. subsequently to 1764.

STIRLING-MAXWELL, Sir William, a Scotch author and politician, who produced a number of valuable works upon the art, history, and literature of Spain. He resided during some time in the Peninsula, in order to make researches upon these subjects. He published "Annals of the Artists of Spain;" "The Cloister Life of the Emperor Charles V.;" "Velasquez and his Works." He represented the county of Perth during many years, and, in 1866, succeeded to the title and estates of his uncle, Sir John Maxwell. b. at Kenmure, near Glasgow, 1818.

STIRLING, Earl of. (See ALEXANDER, William.)

STOBÆUS, Johannes, sto-bæ'-us, a Greek author, who made a collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers, the best modern edition of which is that of Heeren, 1801. Flourished in the 5th century.

STODART, James, stod'-art, an eminent English cutler, who, by his experiments, contributed to the improvements in the manufacture of surgical instruments. He was the friend of Sir Humphry Davy and other distinguished men of his time, and was one of the earliest patrons of Faraday, whom he employed in making analyses of a peculiar description of Indian steel, called by the natives of Bombay "Wootz." His great skill in forging and manufacturing delicate pieces of philosophical apparatus in which steel was employed, enabled him to render material assistance to experimental philosophers. For the pendulum researches of Captain Kater, he forged some beautiful pieces of cutlery. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and in conjunction with Mr. Faraday, produced a paper entitled, "Experiments on the Alloys of Steel, made with a view to its Improvement," which was inserted in the "Quarterly Journal of Science," in 1820. b. in London, 1760; d. at Edinburgh, 1823.

STODDART, Sir John, an English lawyer and political writer, who received his early education at the Salisbury grammar-school; whence he proceeded to Christchurch College, Oxford. In 1801 he became a member of the College of Advocates, and soon afterwards published a work, entitled "Remarks on Local Senecty and Manners in Scotland during the years 1789 to 1800." Three years later, he received the appointment of king's advocate and admiralty advocate at Malta. After fulfilling the duties of this post during four years, he returned to England, and commenced practice in the courts of Doctor's Commons. In 1810 he became connected with the "Times" newspaper, of which he was appointed political editor two years afterwards. Taking Burke as his model, his contributions to that journal were remarkable for their denunciation of French revolutionary politics and of the Emperor Napoleon. His violent and persistent attacks upon Napoleon, even after the latter had been sent to Saint Helena, led to his dismissal from the staff of the "Times," upon which he set up an opposition journal, entitled "The New Times."

This was a failure; and Stoddart shortly afterwards resumed his practice as an advocate. He was knighted and nominated chief justice and judge of the Vice-Admiralty court of Malta, in 1826, retaining the appointment until 1830. In that year he returned to England, and during the remainder of his life devoted himself to literary occupations. He, however, took a warm interest in the question of law reform, and was one of the first and most energetic members of the Law Amendment Society. He was the author of "An Introduction to General History;" "Universal Grammar, or Science of Language;" written for the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," but afterwards reprinted as a separate work. He likewise compiled a "Statistical, Administrative, and Commercial Chart of the United Kingdom;" and in early life he produced translations of Schiller's dramas, "Fiesco" and "Don Carlos." b. in Westminster, 1773; d. at Brompton, 1856.

STOCKHARDT, Julius Adolf, ste(r)k'-hart, a modern German chemist, who commenced his studies under his father, a Protestant minister, but was subsequently placed at the university of Berlin. After travelling in England and France, he worked in the laboratory of Struve, at Dresden, and at the School of Arts and Sciences at Chemnitz, which latter place he quitted in 1847, on being appointed professor of chemistry in the Academy of Rural Economy at Tharand. His works upon agricultural chemistry place him beside Liebig; and he was very successful in placing the discoveries made in his favourite science in a popular manner before general readers. He was the author of "The School of Chemistry," "A Discourse upon Chemistry as it relates to the German Mode of Agriculture," and a treatise upon "Organic Chemistry." b. near Meissen, Saxony, 1809.

STOLBERG, Leopold Frederick, Count von, stol'-berg, a Danish poet, who travelled in Italy and Switzerland with Goëthe and Lavater, and later in life represented his native country as minister at the courts of Russia and Prussia. His principal works were, translations of the "Iliad," of Ossian, and of Æschylus; an account of his travels in Italy, Switzerland, and Germany; and some religious treatises. b. at Bramstedt, Holstein, 1750; d. near Osnabrück, 1818.

sculptor, who was appointed master-mason to Charles I. He executed a number of monuments, the most important of which is one to Lucy, countess of Bedford, for which he received £1020. He was employed as master-mason in building the Banqueting-house, Whitehall. The great gate and front of St. Mary's, Oxford, were also built by him. p. 1647. —His sons Nicholas and Henry were excellent statuaries. The latter was also a good painter, and copied some fine pictures after Titian and other painters. p. 1663.

STONE, Edmund, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who was the son of a gardener upon the estate of the duke of Argyll, and his education was of course confined within very narrow limits. His own application, however, supplied the deficiency; and at the age of 18, with no other assistance than a little received from the duke's butler, he made himself master of arithmetic, algebra, and geometry. He afterwards acquired the French and Latin languages. He published a "Mathematical Dictionary," a "Treatise on Fluxions," and some other works. b. towards the close of the 17th century; d. 1768.

STONE, Frank, an eminent modern English painter, who was the son of a Manchester cotton-spinner, and was designed for the same pursuit; but, after having followed a business career until his 24th year, he entered upon the artistic profession, in which he subsequently achieved a great success. In his 31st year he went to London, where, for about nine years, he practised water-colour painting. In 1840, however, he exhibited a fine oil-painting, entitled "The Legend of Montrose," which attracted a considerable amount of attention; but the greatest of his early successes was won in 1841, by a subject entitled "The Heart's Misgivings," since so well known as an engraving. His popularity increased yearly till, in 1861, he became an A.R.A. From that period he continued to exhibit regularly, and was accounted one of the best draughtsmen, colourists, and characteristic artists of the English school. Some of his pictures, but not the best, have attained an extraordinary amount of popularity on being reproduced as engravings. Of these may be mentioned, "The First Appeal," "The Last Appeal," "Impending Mate," "Mated." His fame as an artist will, however, rest upon such productions as "The Master is Come," a Scriptural subject; "Bon Jour, Messieurs;" "The Gardener's Daughter," from Tennyson's poem, &c. b. at Manchester, 1800; d. 1869.

STONEHOUSE, Sir James, ston'-house, an English physician and divine, who, after practising medicine for about twenty years, entered into orders, and obtained the lectureship of All Saints, Bristol, and two livings in Wiltshire. He had been for several years an infidel, and had even written a pamphlet against revealed religion, which reached three editions; but by reading Dr. Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion," he was converted. He was a most exemplary divine and an eloquent preacher. He succeeded to the title of baronet in 1791. He wrote "Friendly Advice to a Patient," and several religious pamphlets. b. at Tubney, near Abingdon, Berks, 1716; d. at Bristol, 1795.

long settled in England. During his short but brilliant career he produced the music for the "Haunted Tower," "Siege of Belgrade," "No Song no Supper," as well as several pieces composed for the Italian opera, all of which exhibit an undoubted genius for music. b. in London, 1763; d. in the same city, 1796. —His sister Anna was a celebrated vocalist.

STORCK, Abraham, stork, an eminent Dutch artist, who painted marine pieces and views of shipping in harbours, with great numbers of figures, in an excellent style. d. at Amsterdam, 1703. p. 1814.

STORX, Joseph, stor'-e, an eminent American judge and writer upon jurisprudence, who commenced practice in 1801, and soon became one of the most distinguished lawyers of the United States. In 1811 he was nominated associate judge of the Supreme Court, and at a subsequent period accepted the Dana professorship of law at Harvard University. His legal works enjoy a European reputation, and are highly esteemed even in England, where the legal literature of other countries is less regarded than elsewhere. His principal works were, "Commentaries on the Conflicts of Laws;" "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States;" treatises upon Equity Jurisprudence, the Law of Bailments, of Bills of Exchange, of Promissory Notes, and of Partnership. b. at Marblehead, Massachusetts, U.S., 1779; d. at Cambridge, near Boston, 1845.

STOTHARD, Thomas, stot'-hard, an eminent English painter, who was apprenticed to the business of a pattern-designer for brocaded silks, which pursuit he relinquished on obtaining some success as a draughtsman for the "Town and Country Magazine." He was next employed to make designs for Bell's "British Poets" and the "Novelist's Magazine." In consequence of the reputation he acquired while engaged upon these works, his services were sought by almost every publisher of his time requiring for his productions the aid of an artist's pencil. Meanwhile he diligently pursued a course of study at the Royal Academy; and, after exhibiting some pictures, was, in 1785, elected an associate of that body. He became a full academican in 1794. He is stated to have made more than five thousand designs. His best book-illustrations were those in "Rogers's Poems;" "The Complete Angler;" and "Boydell's Shakspeare." A very interesting biography of him was produced by Mrs. Bray in 1851. b. in London, 1755; d. 1834.

STOTHARD, Charles Alfred, an eminent English antiquarian draughtsman, and son of the preceding, who, after studying during several years at the Royal Academy, in 1810 exhibited his first historical painting, entitled "The Death of Richard II. in Pomfret Castle." He subsequently turned his attention towards antiquities, and produced a most valuable work upon the monumental effigies of Great Britain. In this very successful undertaking, it was the draughtsman's object to provide historical painters with drawings of the costumes adopted in England from an early period down to the close of the reign of Henry VIII., the drawings being all made from the monuments contained in the English churches. In 1815 he was engaged to make drawings for Lysons' "Magna Britannia." In the following year he was sent to France by the Society of Antiquaries to copy the figures upon the Bayeux tapestry. While in France, he discovered the monuments of Henry II., Richard I., Berengaria his queen, an enamelled tablet of Geoffrey Plantagenet, and other relics connected with English history. In 1819, when laying before the Society of Antiquaries his drawings from the Bayeux tapestry, he read to that body a paper, in which he proved that the tapestry was in reality executed about the time of the Norman invasion, instead of in the time of Henry I., as was attempted to be shown by the Abbé de la Rue. In 1821, while making a tracing in a church in Devonshire, he unfortunately fell from a ladder and was killed on the spot. s. in London, 1786.

Stow, John, stow, an eminent English antiquary and historian, who is supposed to have been brought up to the trade of a tailor, and to have followed it as a business, as his father and grandfather had done before him. It is conjectured that from an early age he devoted his leisure to the study of the national antiquities; but his own and other accounts vary much in this respect. In the dedication of his "Annals," dated 1600, he says, however, "It is now nigh forty years since I first addressed all my cares and cogitations to the study of histories and search of antiquities." According to Strype, Stow's historical works were, his "Chronicle," his "Summary of Chronicles," and his "Annals; or, a General Chronicle of England." His celebrated "Survey of London" was first published in 1598. Stow himself also states that he continued Holinshed's "Chronicles," from 1576 to 1598, and likewise corrected divers written copies from which the text of Chaucer was printed in 1569. In his old age he was reduced to beg his bread; James I. having granted him letters patent to collect "voluntary contributions and kind gratuities" for his subsistence. s. in London, 1825; p. in the same city, 1605.

Stowe, Mrs. Harriet Elizabeth Beecher, a modern American authoress, who was one of the twelve children of the Rev. Lyman Beecher, an eminent Presbyterian preacher of the United States. At an early age she assisted her sister Catherine Esther Beecher in teaching a school which had been opened by the latter at Hartford; but, upon the removal of her family to Cincinnati, in 1832, she became acquainted with, and married, her father's colleague, the Rev. Professor Calvin E. Stowe, well known, both in England and America, as a writer upon theological subjects. Her first efforts in literature took the shape of tales and essays, written for a charitable purpose, and inserted in the magazines and newspapers of her native country. Both her husband and father had long taken a warm interest in the "peculiar institution" which forms the great question of the American republic, and both had enrolled themselves among the most energetic members of the Abolition Convention. Their hearty denunciations of slavery proved so distasteful to the people of Cincinnati, that both the reverend gentlemen were at length compelled to resign their appointments there. In 1850 Professor Stowe accepted the chair of Biblical Literature in the Theological College of Andover, Massachusetts; and it was while a resident there that Mrs. Stowe wrote her famous tale of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which at first appeared in the "Washington National Era." Upon its republication it attained a circulation of 200,000 copies in the United States; and this great success was but the forerunner of a still more extraordinary one, obtained in England and elsewhere. The work was translated into every language, and literally went the round of the globe. Its statements naturally evoked much hostile criticism in the United States, and in answer to her opponents Mrs. Stowe published, in 1853, a "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin," in which she gave many facts and documents as the basis of her representations. Accompanied by her husband and brother, she visited England in 1853, and, after a sojourn in several places in Great Britain, as well as upon the continent, she, after her return to her native country, produced her travelling impressions, in a work entitled "Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands." In 1856 she published "Dred, a Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp;" in 1859 a work upon the social condition of the United States, entitled "The Minister's Wooing;" and contributed a tale to the pages of the "Cornhill Magazine," under the title of "Agnes of Sorrento." In addition to the works already quoted, Mrs. Stowe wrote, "The Mayflower; or Sketches of Scenes and Characters among the Descendants of the Pilgrims;" "Temperance Tales;" and a number of smaller effusions; and in 1863 published a novel called "Old Town Folk." s. at Litchfield, Connecticut, 1814.

Stowell, William Scott, Lord, sto-el, an eminent English lawyer, who was the elder brother of the Earl of Eldon. He pursued a distinguished career at the University of Oxford, after which he entered himself at the Middle Temple as a student of the law. In 1780 he was called to the bar, and was admitted of the Faculty of Advocates at Doctors' Commons. A couple of years previously, he had made the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, who caused him to be admitted a member of the celebrated Literary Club. His great learning and eminently social qualities soon enabled him to distinguish himself in that branch of the legal profession which he had chosen. He became, in rapid succession, registrar of the Court of Faculties, judge of the Consistory Court, vicar-general to the archbishop of Canterbury, and, in 1793, was appointed judge of the High Court of Admiralty. In 1801 he was chosen as the parliamentary representative of the university of Oxford, and held his seat in the House of Commons until 1821, at which period he was created Baron Stowell of Stowell Park. In ecclesiastical law and the law of nations, he is the greatest English authority. His invaluable decisions as an ecclesiastical judge have been reported by Drs. Phillimore, Edwards, Haggard, &c. s. at Heworth, near Newcastle, 1745; p. in Berkshire, 1836.

Strabo, stra'-bo, a celebrated Greek geographer, who was educated under Xenarchus, the Peripatetic, and afterwards under Athenodorus, a Stoic. Of all his works, only his "Geography" is extant; and passages in the work show that he travelled in Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Greece, &c. In his "Geography" he stated that the habitable world was surrounded by water, and that in length it was about double its breadth. There is a cheap edition of the text of Strabo in Teubner's "Leipzig Classics." s. about 50 B.C., and is supposed to have died about 20 A.D.

Strada or Stradanus, John, stra'-da, an eminent Flemish painter, who went, at an early age, to Italy, where he was employed by Cosmo II., duke of Florence. He afterwards visited Naples and other Italian cities; but he chiefly resided at Florence, where many of his fine works are still preserved. He excelled, not only in sacred subjects, but painted animals, battles, and hunting-parties admirably. b. 1536; d. about 1604.

STRADA, Famianus, an eminent Italian historian, who was a member of the society of Jesuits, in whose college at Rome he was, during fifteen years, professor of the belles-lettres. He wrote the "History of the Wars in the Low Countries" in Latin which is remarkable for its purity. b. 1572; d. 1619.

STRADILLA, Alexander, stra-dail'-la, an eminent Italian composer, who was remarkable for his finely-proportioned frame, polished manners, and exquisite voice. Whilst at Venice he was engaged by a nobleman to teach music to his mistress, a highly-born lady. The lady conceived a fresh passion for the musician, with whom she fled to Rome, where the pair were married. The Venetian noble hired two bravos to assassinate Stradella and his newly-wedded bride; but, as the assassins were about to strike the blow, they heard the musician sing, and were so overcome by the beauty of his voice, that they not only refrained from executing their murderous commission, but confessed to Stradella the plot in which they had been engaged. The implacable Venetian, however, found a pair of less susceptible murderers at a later period; and both Stradella and his wife were stabbed to death at Genoa by the agents of their enemy in 1670. His compositions are said to have formed the model of Purcell, Steffani, Pergolesi, and other celebrated musicians.

STRADIVARIUS, Antony, strād-i-vair'-i-us, celebrated stringed-instrument maker, who was the pupil of Amati. He himself taught the eminent Joseph Guarcerius. The violins made by him are highly esteemed, and have obtained as high a price as £400 each. b. at Cremona about 1670; d. at the same city, about 1728.

STRAFFORD, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of straf'-ford, an English statesman, who was at first one of the principal leaders of the popular party in the House of Commons against the unconstitutional measures of Charles I.; but was gained over to the court, made a peer, and appointed president of the North and lord-lieu tenant of Ireland. Strafford displayed some talents for government in Ireland, where he encouraged agriculture, and laboured with zeal to promote the Protestant interest. Whilst Charles governed without a Parliament, Strafford was his willing instrument in illegally imposing taxes upon the kingdom. In 1640 he was appointed to the command of the army against the Scotch, and endeavoured to persuade the king to act with vigour; but his advice was overruled. At the opening of the Long Parliament, his enemies in the Commons, with Pym at their head, impeached him at the bar of the Lords, and he was ordered into custody. His trial lasted eighteen days, and was carried on with unusual virulence. His defence made a deep impression upon the hearers, though it did not abate the energy of his persecutors, who introduced a bill of attainder against him. The bill was passed in both houses of Parliament, and Charles I. was weak enough to give his assent to it. The king afterwards made some slight and fruitless attempts to save the life of the minister who had been his too zealous tool in the despotic measures which he attempted against the liberties of his subjects. On the day of execution Strafford went forth to the block with the manner of "a general marching at the head of an army to breathe victory, rather than those of a condemned man, to undergo the sentence of death." The attainder was reversed in the reign of Charles II., and the earldom restored to his son. b. in London, 1583; executed on Tower Hill, 1641.

STRAHAN, William, strawn, an eminent Scotch printer, who, in 1770, purchased a share of the office of king's printer, and subsequently £1000 to the company of Stationers; the interest to be divided, in annuities of £5 each, amongst old and infirm printers. b. at Edinburgh, 1715; d. 1785.

STRANGE, Sir Robert, strain', an eminent engraver, who was apprenticed to Mr. Cooper, of Edinburgh. He fought under the Pretender, and, after experiencing many privations subsequently to the battle of Culloden, went to Edinburgh, and, at a later period, improved himself in France. In 1751 he went to London, where he applied himself to historical engraving, in which he arrived at great excellence. In 1760 he went to Italy, where he was chosen a member of the Academies of Rome, Florence, and Bologna, and appointed professor of the Royal Academy at Parma; and at Paris he was made a member of the Royal Academy of Painting. In 1787 he received the honour of knighthood. b. at Pomona, one of the Orkney Isles, 1721; d. 1792.

matist, and poet of some reputation, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. in 1800, obtaining the gold medal and other honorary distinctions. Before he was of age he had furnished some contributions to the "Poetical Register," and had scarcely attained his majority when he succeeded to his father's peerage in October, 1801. A short time previously he had entered the diplomatic service, and was secretary of legation at Lisbon. Here his love of poetical study found expression in a translation of the poems of Camoens, which he published in 1803, prefixing to it a life of that poet, and which is mentioned by Byron in his satire called "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." In 1800, he was temporarily appointed British minister at Lisbon; a position which, two years later, he exchanged for that of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, being at the same time created a G.C.B. When, in the same year, the Portuguese government emigrated from Lisbon to the Brazils, Lord Strangford was appointed to accompany the court. He returned to England in 1816, and in the following year was sent to the court of Sweden in the same high position which he had occupied at the Portuguese court, and resided at Stockholm till 1820, when he was removed to the post of British ambassador at the Sublime Porte. In 1825, he was sent as ambassador to Russia, a few months before the death of the Emperor Alexander I., and was at St. Petersburg when the Emperor Nicholas ascended the throne. In the summer of 1826 he returned to England, and closed his diplomatic career, if we except a special mission to the Brazils on which he was sent in 1828. In 1825 he was made a Knight Grand Cross of the Hanoverian Guelphic and was invested with the English barony of Penshurst, which gave him a seat in the House of Lords, a title which he chose in order to mark his descent from the wife of the first Lord Strangford, daughter of Robert Sidney, Earl of Leicester, to whom Penshurst belonged, and niece of the famous Sir Philip Sidney. In 1854 he became an honorary D.C.L. of Oxford, at the installation of the great Duke of Wellington, with whom he had formerly been associated as co-plenipotentiary at the Congress of Verona, in 1823. Lord Strangford was a frequent correspondent of the "Gentleman's Magazine," under the initials of his name, P. C. S. S., and the same signature latterly often appeared in "Notes and Queries." He was a fellow and active member of the Society of Antiquaries, of which he was a vice-president. B. 1780; D. 1855.

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Stratford Canning, Viscount, de red'-klif, a modern English diplomatist, who, after leaving the university of Cambridge, was, in 1807, appointed to a subordinate post in the Foreign Office. In 1808 he was named secretary to Sir Robert Adair, who had been sent upon a special mission to Constantinople. He was appointed secretary of legation in 1809, and, upon the recall of his chief, became minister plenipotentiary to the Porte. In 1814 he returned to England, and was dispatched to Switzerland upon a diplomatic mission. After being sworn a member of the privy council, he was, in 1820, appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States. Three years subsequently, he recrossed the Atlantic, and was sent upon a diplomatic mission to St. Petersburg, and next to the court of the emperor of Austria. He resumed his post at Constantinople in 1825, and nobly exerted himself in behalf of the Greeks. For his services he was, in 1829, created a civil knight grand cross of the Bath. About the same time he took his seat in the House of Commons as the representative of the borough of Old Sarum, and afterwards sat for the now extinct borough of Stockbridge, Hants. Returning to the Ottoman Porte in 1831, he was deputed to settle the future boundaries of the Greek kingdom. Upon this settlement, Prince Otho of Bavaria ascended the throne of Greece. He was next dispatched upon a mission to the court of Madrid, and in 1834 again took his seat in Parliament as member for King's Lynn, in Norfolk. After twice refusing the governor-generalship of Canada, he, at the close of the year 1841, returned to his old post at Constantinople, retaining it until 1858. In the year 1852 he was raised to the peerage with the title of Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, a title chosen by himself, on account of his descent from William Cannynge, the pious founder of the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, at Bristol. Subsequently to his return from Constantinople, Lord Stratford frequently spoke in the House of Lords upon Eastern questions. B. in 1788.

STRATICO, Simon, Count, strá'-te-ko, a learned Italian writer, who, as early as his twenty-first year, became professor of medicine in the university of Padua. Under the Italian republic, he was appointed professor of navigation at Pavia; and, when Napoleon created the kingdom of Italy, Stratico was appointed inspector-general of roads, rivers, and canals. He was taken into favour on the return of the Austrians, and received the order of the cross of St. Leopold from the emperor. His most important work was, "A Vocabulary of Maritime Terms," in which he gave the expressions in use among the Venetians and Genoese at the time of their naval power, and added thereto the terms in use in the English and French sea services. He made a very valuable collection of models for shipbuilding, which, after his death, were placed in the Institute of Milan. B. 1730; D. 1824.

STRATHMAYEN, Hugh Henry Rose, Lord, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., was a son of the late Sir George Rose, an eminent diplomatist. He entered the army in 1820, and after a long series of services he resigned in 1865. After his return to England he was raised to the peerage and for some time acted as commander-in-chief in Ireland. B. 1803.

STRATON OF LAMPISACUS, strá'-ton, a Greek Peripatetic philosopher, and the successor of Theophrastus. He passed a portion of his life in Egypt, and taught Ptolemy Philadelphus, for which he was liberally recompensed. He maintained that everything existed through the innate force of nature, which was constantly creating and dissolving. From making physical things his principal study, he received the surname of Physicus. Diogenes Laertius gives a list of his works, all of which are lost. Flourished about 280 B.C.

STRATONICE, strá'-o-ni'-se, a Grecian princess of great beauty, who was the daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and married Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria. Antiochus Soter, her husband's son, became enamoured of her, and fell dangerously ill, so intense was his apparently hopeless passion. Erasistratus, the royal physician, having discovered the cause of his illness, informed his father that, unless he were united to the Grecian princess, he would lose his life; on which Seleucus gave up Stratonice to his son.

STRAUSS, David Frederick, strouss, a modern German writer, who, in 1832, became assistant-teacher in the Theological Institute at Tübingen, and lecturer on philosophy in the university there. In 1835 he produced an extraordinary work, entitled "The Life of Jesus critically treated." "This work," says an eminent authority, "startled the world, as it contained an attempt to prove, with much misdirected acuteness and subtlety, that the whole of the evangelical history was a series of myths, founded, to a considerable extent, on the Old Testament prophecies of the Messiah, concocted in the first and second centuries of the Christian era, and, by degrees, adopted by the Christian community." He was dismissed from his appointments at Tübingen, and, in the following year, became a private tutor at Stuttgart. He replied to his critics, in 1837, in two "Friendly Addresses;" nevertheless, the feeling against him was so strong, that when, in 1839, he was appointed professor of divinity and church history at the university of Zurich, he was not only compelled instantly to resign, but the administration under which he had received the post was overthrown. He subsequently produced a biography of Schubart, the German poet, and "The Doctrine of the Christian Faith." B. at Ludwigsburg, Württemberg, 1808.

at Laleham. He subsequently studied at the university of Oxford; after which he devoted himself to the science of geology, and wrote several valuable papers thereon, which were inserted in the "Proceedings of the Geological Society." In 1835 he, accompanied by Mr. Hamilton, made a tour in Asia Minor, and after his return produced several papers upon the geology of the districts through which he had passed. These sketches are to be found in the "Transactions" of the Geological Society. Upon the resignation of the readership in geology at Oxford by Dr. Buckland, Mr. Strickland succeeded to the post, and retained it until his death. In 1848 he produced a work upon the Dodo, a bird which has become extinct within a comparatively recent period. Of the Zoological Society he was one of the founders, and to his representations is due the publication, at the charge of that body, of Professor Agassiz's valuable "Bibliography of Zoology and Geology," three volumes of which Mr. Strickland himself completed; but before he had finished the fourth, his death took place. This unfortunate event occurred in consequence of his being run over by a train, while engaged in making notes upon the geology of a cutting on the Gainsborough and Retford Railway. He was the author of eighty-six publications upon natural science. B. at Kington, Yorkshire, 1811; killed 1853.

STRICKLAND, Miss Agnes, a distinguished modern English historical writer, who commenced her literary labours at an early age. One of her first productions was a small volume of patriotic lyrics, a few of which were contributed by her sister, Susanna Strickland. Several collections of poems, most of them composed in imitation of Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott, followed. "Tales and Stories from History," the "Pilgrims of Walsingham; or, Tales of the Middle Ages," and a number of similar productions, all of which were in prose, were her next ventures. In 1842 she took a higher flight, and gave to the public the "Letters of Mary Queen of Scots," published from the originals, with historical introductions and notes. In one of her first poetical pieces she had treated of the escape of Mary Beatrice, wife of James II., which "touching incident," she observed, "first suggested the idea that the lives of the queens of England would be found replete with scenes of more powerful interest than any work of fiction that could be offered to the world." Accordingly, in 1840, appeared the first volume of her "Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest, now first published, from Official Records and other Authentic Documents, private as well as public." The work at once became popular, and the twelve volumes in which it is comprised have been several times reprinted. The "Lives of the Queens of Scotland, and English Princesses connected with the Regal Succession of Great Britain," in 6 volumes, were first put forth in 1850. In these works, historical knowledge is laid before the general reader in a very attractive guise; many fresh sources of information have been laid open; and, although the volumes do not of themselves convey all that is required by the student of history, they nevertheless form an agreeable and interesting assistant to his progress. B. at Reydon Hall, near Suffolk, early in the 19th century.

authoress, and sister of the preceding, became the wife of Lieutenant Trail, of the 21st regiment, with whom she emigrated to Canada. She was the authoress of, "The Backwoods of America;" "The Canadian Crusoes, a Tale of the Rice-Lake Plains;" and "Domestic Economy of British America."

STRICKLAND, Miss Susanna, a modern English authoress, and sister of the preceding. Having married Mr. Moodie, an officer of the British army, she accompanied him to Canada. She produced, "Roughing it in the Bush, or, Life in Canada;" "Life in the Clearings, versus the Bush;" and two novels, entitled respectively, "Mark Hurdlestone" and "Flora Lindsay," first published in America, but afterwards reprinted in England.

STRICKLAND, Major, a modern English author, and brother of the preceding. He wrote—"Twenty-seven Years in Canada West, or, the Experiences of an Early Settler."

STROGONOFF, strog'-o-noff, an ancient Russian family, which has produced several distinguished men. Count Alexander Strogonoff was a liberal patron of the arts and sciences, and became president of the Academy of Fine Arts at St. Petersburg. He died in 1811.—His nephew, Count Paul Strogonoff, fought with great bravery against the Turks in Moldavia, in 1809, and subsequently, in 1813-14, against France. He was killed under the walls of Laon in the latter year.—To this family belonged Count Gregory Strogonoff, who was successively ambassador at the courts of Madrid, Stockholm, and Constantinople.

STROZZI, stroz'-se, an ancient and distinguished Florentine family, mention of which in history is first made in the 14th century. The most celebrated members of the Strozzi family were:—

STROZZI, Palla, who was at first the colleague of Cosmo de' Medici, at the congress of Ferrara, in 1432, when a treaty of peace was signed between Florence and Venice on the one side, and the duke of Milan on the other. He subsequently joined the Albizzi against the Medici family. This league was successful at the outset; but, when the Medici regained their former influence at Florence, Palla retired to Padua, where he spent the remainder of his life in studious retirement. He translated the works of John Chrysostom from the Greek into the Latin. D. at Padua, 1462.

STROZZI, Filippo, was a prominent actor in the events which took place at the fall of the Florentine republic. Possessed of great wealth, he was allied to the great Medici family, having espoused Clarice, daughter of Piero, and niece of Leo X. Two illegitimate members of the Medici family, Alessandro and Cardinal Ippolite, were at the time ruling in Florence; and against these unworthy scions of a great house, Filippo, instigated by his wife, excited a revolt in 1527. The movement was successful, and the two Medici were reduced to the condition of private citizens. In 1529, however, the emperor Charles V. gave his natural daughter Margaret in marriage to Alessandro, and resolved to create him duke of Florence. The citizens resisted this arrangement, and opposed an obstinate defence to the attacks made upon Florence by the papal and Imperial troops. In this defence several of the Strozzi displayed great bravery; but, after the defeat of the citizens, Filippo became the partisan of Duke Alessandro, and helped him with his wealth, until, his daughter having been insulted by one of Alessandro's courtiers, he was involved in a quarrel with the dissolute ruler of his country. He retired first to Rome and afterwards to Venice. Duke Alessandro was murdered in 1537; but Charles V. caused Cosmo, another member of the Medici family, to be elected duke of Florence. The Florentine emigrant nobles now resolved to make a desperate attempt to sweep away this new ruler. At the head of 4000 French and Italian mercenaries, Filippo and other leaders invaded Florentine territory, and made themselves masters of the castle of Montemurlo. They were, however, soon afterwards defeated by the troops of Cosmo and the Spanish soldiers of the emperor. Filippo was taken prisoner, and after being kept in confinement during a year, and subjected to the torture, he was about to be delivered by his Spanish captors to the tender mercies of Cosmo, when, in 1539, he found means to cut his own throat with a sword. He was a learned and accomplished nobleman. He translated some apophthegms of Plutarch, and the treatise of Polybius, entitled "On the Mode of Forming Encampments." After his death, the emperor Charles V. confiscated all the funds which he had lodged in banking-houses in Italy, Germany, and Spain; nevertheless, he left to his children, principally in the bank of France, an income of 50,000 crowns. (See "Life of Filippo Strozzi," by Thomas Adolphus Trollope.)

STROZZI, Piero, was the son of the preceding, and was with him in the attempt made against Cosmo in 1537; but succeeded in effecting his escape to France, where he became the favourite of Henry II. and Catherine de' Medici, and was sent in command of an auxiliary French force to Siena, then at war with Cosmo, duke of Florence. Being defeated, however, he retired to Rome, which he bravely held against the duke of Alva, who had been sent to attack it by Philip II. in 1556, until the arrival of the duke of Guise, with a French force, compelled the Spanish commander to withdraw to Naples. In 1558 he was with the duke of Guise when the English lost Calais; but was killed at Thionville in the same year.—His son Filippo distinguished himself in the service of France, and was, in 1587, sent in command of the expedition to the Azores, to support Don Antonio, who claimed the crown of Portugal, against Philip II. of Spain. He was defeated by the Spanish admiral Santa-Cruz, and thrown into the sea.

STROZZI, Titus and Hercules, two Latin poets of Ferrara, were father and son, and belonged to a branch of the great Strozzi family. Their poems consist of elegies and other pieces. Titus died about 1502, at the age of 80. Hercules was killed by a rival in 1506.

STROZZI, Ciriaco, an Italian philosopher, was successively professor of Greek and philosophy at Florence, Bologna, and Pisa. He wrote two books in Greek and Latin to Aristotle's treatise "De Republica." B. at Florence, 1504; D. 1563.

STROUENDE, John Frederick, Count, stroc'-en-se, a German physician, who by his abilities and address gained the favour of the king of Denmark, and was ennobled and made minister of state. The young queen, Caroline Matilda, sister of George III., is believed to have fallen a victim to the insinuating arts of Struensee, who, acquiring at the same time an overpowering hold upon the weak and debased king, became the virtual ruler of Denmark, which, under his despotic and blundering system of government, sank into a state of the greatest destitution. At length the queen-mother formed a party against him. He was arrested with his friend Brandt, and beheaded at Copenhagen. The queen was confined in a prison till demanded by the English court; on which she was delivered up and removed to Zell, in Hanover, where she died 1776. Struensee was B. at Halle, in Saxony, 1737; executed 1772.

STRUENSEE, Karl August von, an eminent German writer, and brother of the preceding, early distinguished himself by his acquirements in mathematics and philosophy; in 1756 he became lecturer at the university of Halle, and in the following year professor at the military academy of Leignitz. At the instance of his brother, who had risen to great favour at the court of Denmark, he repaired to Copenhagen in 1769, and was appointed counsellor of justice, the duties of which office he fulfilled in an exemplary manner. After the execution of Count Struensee, he was allowed to retire from the kingdom. He was subsequently ennobled by Frederick II. of Prussia, and appointed a minister of state at Berlin. He was the author, among other works, of "Short Description of the Commerce of the Principal European States;" "Rudiments of Military Architecture;" and "Rudiments of Artillery." He also made a German translation of Pinto's "Essays upon Political Economy." B. at Halle, Saxony, 1735; D. at Berlin, 1804.

STRUTT, Joseph, strut, an eminent English antiquary, who was an apprentice of the unfortunate engraver Ryland (see RYLAND), and afterwards studied drawing in the Royal Academy. In 1771, however, he commenced his researches in English antiquities, and continued to labour in that path, with great distinction to himself, until his death. He compiled a "Dictionary of Engravers," and produced an "Historical Treatise on the Manners, Customs, Arms, Habits, &c., of the Inhabitants of England," and others upon the "Sports and Pastimes of the People of England," and the "Dress and Habits of the English People." As an engraver, he produced a set of illustrations to the "Pilgrim's Progress." B. at Springfield, Essex, 1749; D. in London, 1802.

STRUVÉ, George Adam, strove, a learned German juriconsult, who became professor of jurisprudence, president of the senate at Jena, and counsellor to the duke of Weimar. He produced a large number of profoundly learned works upon jurisprudence. B. at Magdeburg, 1619; D. 1692.

STRUVÉ, Burchard Gotthelf, son of the preceding, settled at Jena, where he followed the profession of his father. His most important works comprise learned treatises upon the theory and antiquities of public and feudal law, and a "History of Germany," in Latin. B. at Weimar, 1671; D. 1739.

STRYPE, Rev. John, stripe, an eminent English historian, who, upon the completion of his education at the university of Cambridge, entered into holy orders, and was appointed to the living of Low Leyton in Essex, where he resided till within a few years of his death. His principal works are, "Ecclesiastical Memorials of England under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Queen Mary;" "Memorials of Thomas Crammer;" "Lives of Archbishops Parker and Whitgift;" an edition, with large additions, of Stow's "Survey of London;" and "Annals of the Reformation." B. in London, 1643; D. 1737.

STUART, st'u-art, a royal house which gave sovereigns to Scotland and England. Its founder was Robert II. of Scotland, who was declared king in 1371. His descendants reigned in Scotland until 1603, when James VI. succeeded to the English throne, upon the death of Elizabeth, the crowns of the two kingdoms were united, and he ruled over both countries, as James I. of Great Britain. The last king of this line was James II., who, at the Revolution of 1688, fled from England, and died in France. (See ROBERT II., III. of Scotland, JAMES I., II., III., IV., V., of Scotland, JAMES I., CHARLES I., II., JAMES II. of England, and CHARLES EDWARD, the Pretender.)

STUART, Arabella, or Arbella, usually styled the Lady Arabella, was the daughter of Charles Stuart, duke of Lennox, younger brother of Henry, Lord Darnley, husband of Mary Queen of Scots, the father of James I. Her mother was the daughter of Sir William Cavendish, of Chatsworth, Derbyshire, father of the first earl of Devonshire. As great-grandchild of Henry VIII.'s sister Margaret, she stood in the same relationship to Queen Elizabeth as did James Stuart of Scotland, afterwards James I. This affinity to the English throne was the cause of all her misfortunes. In 1603 it was alleged that a plot had been formed to place the crown upon her head, under the protection of Spain, for which Sir Walter Raleigh was tried. There is no proof that such a design was ever entertained, and certainly none that the Lady Arabella knew of it. James I. was strongly opposed to her marriage with any personage, royal, noble, or otherwise. In 1610, however, it was discovered that she was married to William Seymour, grandson of the earl of Hertford. Seymour was at once committed to the Tower, whence, after a confinement of a year, he effected his escape. The Lady Arabella also eluded the vigilance of her keepers, and fled towards France; but was taken in Calais roads, and imprisoned in the Tower, where, in 1615, she died, her sufferings having previously deprived her of reason. B. at Chatsworth, 1575.

STUART, Gilbert, a Scotch historical writer, who received his education at the university of Edinburgh, where his father was professor. His first work of any importance was "A Dissertation concerning the Antiquity of the British Constitution," published in 1767, for which he was created LL.D. of the university of Edinburgh. He next published "A View of Society in Europe." Disappointed of the professorship of law at Edinburgh, he removed to London, and became a writer in the "Monthly Review." In 1774 he returned to Edinburgh, and began a magazine and review, which failed; after which he again repaired to London, where he engaged in literary avocations until a short period before his death. He produced, in addition to the works already quoted, "Observations concerning the Public Law and Constitutional History of Scotland;" "The History of the Reformation in Scotland;" "The History of Scotland from the Reformation to the Death of Queen Mary," whom he defends with ability against Dr. Robertson and others. B. at Edinburgh, either 1742 or 1746; D. 1786. C.

STUART, Sir Charles, a distinguished British officer, the fourth son of the earl of Bute, prime minister of George III. during the first three years of his reign, entered the army as ensign in the 37th regiment, in 1768, and was soon after appointed aide-de-camp to Lord Harcourt in Ireland. He was major of the 43rd regiment in 1775, and accompanied his corps to America, and, obtaining the command of a battalion of grenadiers, served with distinction through the greater part of the war. Having attained the rank of major-general in 1793, he was, in 1794, appointed to command the troops serving in Corsica, where he captured Calvi, and thus expelled the French from the island. He was sent in 1797 with a corps of 8000 men to Portugal, to assist in the defence of that country against the threatened attack of the French; and not only contributed to the immediate safety of the Lusitanian territory, but by making himself thoroughly acquainted with the topography of the country, supplied information which was of essential service to the duke of Wellington at a subsequent period. In 1798, General Stuart succeeded in obtaining the surrender of Minorca, which he had been sent to attack; and for this service was made lieutenant-general and a knight of the Bath. He shortly afterwards took possession of Messina, on the retreat of the Neapolitan royal family to Sicily on the conquest of Naples by the French; and in 1800 was made commander of the forces in the Mediterranean. On being ordered, however, to give up Malta to Russia, and his remonstrances against the step being disregarded, he resigned the command, though his views were subsequently adopted by the government. B. 1753; D. 1801.

STUART, James, a celebrated English architect, commonly called Athenian Stuart. His mother was left a widow in poor circumstances, with four children, of whom James was the eldest, who, when very young, maintained the rest of the family by painting fans. He subsequently proceeded to Italy, and, forming an intimacy with Mr. Revett, the architect, they went to Athens, where they made a number of drawings of the remains of ancient architecture. In 1762 the first volume appeared of "The Antiquities of Athens," to which two volumes more were added after the death of Stuart. He built the chapel at Greenwich Hospital, and some mansions in London. B. in London, 1713; D. 1804.

STUART, Gilbert Charles, sometimes styled American Stuart, the best portrait-painter that America has produced. Born of Scotch parents, he crossed the Atlantic, and for some time resided at Edinburgh. In 1777 he became the pupil, in London, of his countryman Benjamin West, and, having made great progress, set up in practice as a portrait-painter, with considerable success. He subsequently went to Paris, where he had many distinguished sitters. He retired to his native country in 1793, and while a resident at Philadelphia, painted a portrait of Washington, which is the best likeness extant of the patriot. B. at Narraganset, Rhode Island, 1755; D. at Boston, 1828.

STUART, Lord Dudley Coutts, the well-known and respected friend of Poland, was the eighth son of John, first Marquis of Bute, and the only son of his second marriage with Frances, daughter of Mr. Thomas Coutts, the eminent banker. His early education was conducted by a private tutor, and having graduated at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1823, he proceeded on a continental tour. In 1824 he married a daughter of Lucien Bonaparte, Prince of Canino. In 1830 he became M.P. for Arundel, and distinguished himself by his advocacy of the Reform Bill and the other measures supported by the liberal party. After being without a seat in Parliament for ten years, he was returned for Marylebone in 1847, and continued to sit for that borough till his death. He was throughout his career remarkable for sedulous attention to his Parliamentary duties, and for his efforts to promote every good and patriotic work; but his chief title to fame rests on his attachment to the Polish cause, which he embraced with alacrity on the outbreak of the insurrection in Poland in 1830, and to which he adhered through good and bad report with an undeviating constancy which has endeared his memory to the friends of Poland and the enemies of oppression throughout the world. B. 1803; D. at Stockholm, 1854.

STUART-WORTLEY, Lady Emmeline, the second daughter of the Duke of Rutland, by the Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the 5th Earl of Carlisle, at an early age gained some reputation as an authoress of poetry and works of a lighter kind. She was a frequent contributor to the pages of the "Keepsake," travels in the United States, published under the title of "Eteetera," as well as "Portugal and Madeira," "A Voyage in a Russian Steamer to St. Petersburg," and poems of various kinds. In 1831 she married the Hon. Charles Stuart-Wortley, brother of Lord Wharncliffe, but was left a widow in 1844. She died at Beyrout in 1855 from having her leg fractured by the kick of a mule, which threw her while she was riding on the hills in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. B. 1806.

STURDY, John, stud-le, an English poet in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who received his education first at Westminster school, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge. He held a command under Prince Maurice; and translated into English several of the tragedies of Seneca. Killed at the siege of Breda, 1590.

STURKEY, William, stuke-le, a learned English antiquary, who, after taking his doctor's degree, settled at Boston, in Lincolnshire, whence he removed to London, and was chosen member of the Royal Society, and also of the Society of Antiquaries on its revival. In 1730 he entered into orders, and in 1747 was presented to the rectory of St. George, Queen-square, London. His principal works are, "Itinerarium Curiosum; or, an Account of the Antiquities and Curiosities in Great Britain;" "An Account of Stonehenge and Abury;" "Palæographia Sacra; or, Discourses on the Monuments of Antiquity that relate to Sacred History;" "History of Carausius;" and "Dissertation on the Spleen." He was called, on account of his knowledge of British antiquities, the "Arch Druid." B. at Holbeach, Lincolnshire, 1687; D. 1765.

STURGEON, William, stur-jon, a distinguished electrician, was born of humble parents at Whittington, in Lancashire, and was apprenticed to a shoemaker. In 1802 he entered the Westmoreland militia; and two years later enlisted in the royal artillery, in which corps he remained about twenty years. While in this corps he made himself familiar with all the great facts of electricity and magnetism, which were then opening to the world. His earliest essays on electro-magnetism appeared in the "Philosophical Magazine" in 1823 and 1824. In 1825 he published the description of a complete set of novel electro-magnetic apparatus in the "Transactions" of the Society of Arts, for which the Society awarded him their large silver medal, with a purse of thirty guineas. He continued to furnish contributions to the "Philosophical Magazine" from time to time; and in 1830 published a pamphlet, entitled "Experimental Researches in Electro-Magnetism, Galvanism," &c., comprising series of original experiments, and exhibiting an improvement in the preparation of the positive plates of the galvanic apparatus. In 1836, Mr. Sturgeon communicated a paper to the Royal Society, describing an original magnetic electrical machine, in which a most ingenious contrivance was adopted for uniting the reciprocating electric currents, developed so as to give them one uniform direction. In the same year, he perfected two other important inventions. The first of these was that of the electro-magnetic coil machine, an instrument devised for the purpose of giving a succession of electric shocks in medical treatment. The other was

"Annals of Electricity, Magnetism, and Galvanism;" and published a treatise on electricity and galvanism; and one of his latest labours was the publication, in a collected form, of his numerous philosophical memoirs. Soon after he left the army, he was appointed to the chair of experimental philosophy in the East India Company's Military Academy at Addiscombe. In 1842 he became superintendent of the Victoria Gallery of Practical Science at Manchester; but this institution was soon afterwards discontinued; and Mr. Sturgeon, in the decline of life, became overwhelmed with difficulties, which, however, were to a small extent mitigated by a government pension of £50 a year. B. 1783; D. 1850.

STURM, John, sturm, a learned German writer, who studied at Louvain, after which he set up a printing-press, and printed several Greek authors. In 1529 he visited Paris, where he read lectures upon Greek and Latin authors, and also on logic; but being a Protestant, he was obliged to remove to Strasburg, where, through his efforts, the gymnasium of that city was elevated into a university. His works, all of which were written in such elegant Latin that he obtained the title of the German Cicero, chiefly consist of notes on Aristotle, Cicero, and other authors. B. near Cologne, 1507; D. 1589.

STURM, John Christopher, a German mathematician, who became professor of philosophy and mathematics at Altdorf, which office he retained during thirty-four years. He published a translation of Archimedes into German; "A Course of Mathematics," which has been translated into English, a Latin translation of the "Hydraulic Architecture" of Boeckler, and some treatises upon pneumatics, &c. B. at Hippelestern, Bavaria, 1635; D. at Altdorf, 1703.

STURM, Leonard Christopher, a German architect, and son of the preceding. He published "A Complete Course of Architecture." B. at Altdorf, 1669; D. 1718.

STURM, James Charles Francis, an eminent Swiss mathematician, who repaired to Paris in his 20th year, and so highly distinguished himself by his attainments as to gain the appointment of professor of mathematics in the Polytechnic school. He was the discoverer of the celebrated theorem which is named after him. In 1840 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and was awarded the gold Copley medal of that body for "his valuable mathematical labours in the solution of a problem which has baffled some of the greatest mathematicians that the world has produced." He also wrote several valuable treatises upon optics, mechanics, geometry, and pure analysis, for the "Memoirs" of the French Academy of Sciences, and the journals of other eminent bodies. b. at Geneva, 1803; d. at Paris, 1855.

STURMIUS, James, stoor'-me-oos, a German statesman, who was sent as ambassador to several foreign countries, and was deputy to the diets of the empire. He contributed to the reformation of religion at Strasburg, to the erecting of a college, and assisted Sleidan in his "History of the Reformation." b. at Strasburg, 1489; d. at the same city, 1558.

STURT, John, sturt, an engraver, who is principally celebrated for the extraordinary minuteness and beauty of his lettering. The most curious of his works is the "Book of Common Prayer," which he executed on silver plates. Each page is headed with a vignette, and prefixed to the book is a portrait of George I., the lines of the face being expressed by writing so small, as scarcely to be read with a magnifying glass. This writing consists of the Lord's prayer, the decalogue, the prayers for the royal family, and the 21st Psalm. b. 1658; d. 1730.

SUCCHET, Louis Gabriel, soc'-ehai, a celebrated French general and marshal, who, at the outburst of the Revolution, joined the army as a volunteer of the cavalry of Lyons. He distinguished himself at the siege of Toulon in 1793, and again in 1795, at Loano, in Italy, where he captured three Austrian standards, and under Massena he was created a chef de brigade. Having exhibited great ability as a tactician while acting as chief of General Joubert's staff in Italy, he attracted the favourable notice of General Bonaparte, who promoted him to be Massena's second in command. He gave eminent proofs of his ability soon afterwards, when, in 1800, he first kept in check, and next cut off the retreat of the Austrian general Melas, who had 40,000 men under his command, Suchet's troops numbering only 8000. By the brilliant manoeuvres he executed upon this occasion, he rendered the greatest assistance to Bonaparte, who, with the main body of the French army, was crossing the Great St. Bernard. After the battle of Marengo, at which he was present, he was intrusted with the government of Genoa. He next commanded the centre of the Army of Italy. In 1805 he was placed in command of a division under Marshal Lannes, and it was to his skilful dispositions that the memorable victory at Austerlitz was due. In the following year he defeated Prince Frederick of Prussia, and captured from him thirty pieces of cannon. To that important advantage, in contesting which the gallant Prussian prince lost his life, Napoleon owed the impunity by which he was enabled to fall upon the rear of the Prussians. In 1807 Suchet repelled the attack made upon his division by the Russian general Essen. His reputation was now so high, that Napoleon gave him the command of the fifth division of the Army of Spain, advanced him to the highest grade of the Legion of Honour, granted him a pension of 20,000 francs, and created him a count of the empire. His Spanish campaign forms the most brilliant era in his career. Napier, in his "History of the Peninsular War," declares that "Suchet was no ordinary man; and with equal vigour and prudence he commenced a system of discipline in his corps, and of order in his government, that afterwards carried him, with scarcely a check, from one success to another, until he obtained the rank of marshal for himself and the honour for his corps of being the only one in Spain that never suffered any signal reverse." In rapid succession he defeated each Spanish general that opposed him, and made himself master of the fortresses of Lerida, Mequinenza, Tortosa, and the city of Tarragona, which was defended by 18,000 Spaniards, 6000 of whom are stated to have fallen. Mont-Serrat, hitherto considered impregnable, was next taken. For these great achievements Suchet was created a marshal of the empire in 1811. In the same year he defeated the Spanish general Blake, and 30,000 men, under the walls of Murviedro; Valencia capitulated to him in 1812, and he soon became master of the whole province of that name. Napoleon marked his sense of the brilliant services performed by his lieutenant by creating him duke of Albufera. Unlike some of the other French generals, he ruled both in Valencia and Aragon with humanity and justice. Lord Wellington's successes compelled Suchet, after the battle of Vittoria, to retreat upon Catalonia, and afterwards to entirely evacuate Spanish territory. He conducted his retreat in an orderly manner; and, on reaching Narbonne in 1814, gave in his adhesion to the new order of things. While Louis XVIII. remained upon the throne, Suchet held the command of the tenth corps; but after the return of Napoleon from Elba, he again took service under his old chief. He commanded the Army of the Alps, numbering 10,000 men; and, on being compelled to retreat at the approach of 100,000 Austrians, he occupied Lyons; on the subsequent surrender of which city he obtained honourable terms. At the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was for a time in disgrace; but in 1819 was reinstated in all his honours, civil and military. The remaining years of his life were spent in composing his "Memoirs," which were published in 1826. Suchet deservedly takes rank among the best of Napoleon's generals. Napoleon, on being asked whom he considered the first of his officers, replied,—"I think Suchet is probably the first; Massena was, but you may say that he is dead." The latter was at the time (1817) fast sinking. Suchet was b. at Lyons, 1770; d. at Marseilles, 1826.

SUCKLING, Sir John, suk'-ling, an English poet, who, after receiving a liberal education, went abroad, and made a campaign under Gustavus Adolphus. On his return to England, he became famous at court for his ready, sparkling wit. He raised a troop of horse for the king's service; but his men behaved so ill in the engagement with the Scotch, in 1639, on the English borders, as to bring upon him much ridicule. His works consist of poems and letters, "An Account of Religion by Reason," and four plays. Several of his songs are very fine. b. at Suetonius, Caius Suetonius Tranquillus, sue-to-ni-us, a Roman historian, who is supposed to have been educated for the bar. He was the intimate friend of Pliny the Younger, by whose means he was made tribune. Suetonius was afterwards secretary to the emperor Adrian. Of his works, his "Lives of the First Twelve Emperors," two treatises concerning illustrious grammarians and rhetoricians, and several lives of poets, have been preserved. b. about 70 A.D.; d. about 123.

SUFFOLK, William de la Pole, Earl, and afterwards Duke of, suf-fok, an English general, and grandson of Michael de la Pole, first earl of Suffolk. He served under Henry V. in the wars with France, distinguished himself at Rouen in 1419, and was, in 1429, nominated by the duke of Bedford commander-in-chief of the troops before Orleans, but was forced to raise the siege by Joan of Arc. After enjoying great favour, he was, in 1450, charged with treason and beheaded.

SUFFOLK, Charles Brandon, Duke of, was the friend from youth of Henry VIII. who created him duke of Suffolk in 1513. Charged to conduct to England, Mary, sister of the English king, and widow of Louis XII. of France, he gained the affections of that princess, whom he married in 1515. d. 1545.

SURDAS, su-il-da, or sul-das, a Greek lexicographer, whose Greek lexicon, historical and geographical, which contains much valuable information, is extant. The latest edition is that of Bekker, Berlin, 1854. Supposed to have flourished in the 10th or 11th century.

SULLY, Maximilien de Bethune, Duke of, sool-le, a celebrated French statesman, who, at an early age, became the companion of Henry of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, whom he accompanied to Paris, where he fortunately escaped death during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, by the kindness of the principal of the College of Burgundy, who concealed him for three days. He subsequently escaped with Henry of Navarre from Paris; and in the civil war which broke out, held a command under Henry and the Prince de Condé. He displayed great valour on many occasions, particularly at the siege of Marmande, and the battles of Contras, Arques, and Ivry. After the accession of Henry to the French throne, Sully was appointed minister of finance; in rian, who was likewise distinguished eloquence and piety. He wrote the "Life of St. Martin of Tours," and an "Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History." Flourished at the commencement of the 5th century.

SWITZER, John George, sool-tzer, a learned Swiss writer, who became professor of mathematics at Berlin, and member of the Royal Academy in that city. His principal works are, "Moral Contemplations on the Works of Nature," "Treatise on Education," "Universal Theory of the Fine Arts." b. at Winterthur, canton of Zurich, 1720; d. at Berlin, 1779.

SUMAROKOFF, Alexander, soo-mul-ro-kof, a Russian dramatic author, and surnamed the father of the Russian stage. His tragedies led the foundation of the Russian theatre, and being performed with applause before the empress, animated him to proceed in the dramatic career, which he did with great success, and was appointed to the rank of brigadier, and director of the theatre. He also received a pension, was nominated counsellor of state, and knighted.
He wrote several poems and some historical orks. b. at St. Petersburg, 1718; d. at Moscow, 1777.

SUMNER, John Bird, D.D., sum-ner, an English prelate, was the eldest son of the Rev.
Robert Sumner, vicar of Kenilworth, and the grandson of Dr. John Sumner, formerly provost of King's College, Cambridge. He was educated at Eton, and at King's College, Cambridge; and in 1800 carried off Sir William Browne's medal for the best Latin ode, a prize which has since been hotly contested, and was once considered in the university as the Blue Ribbon in the Latin poetic field. In 1802 Mr.
Sumner won the Hulsean prize. In 1808 he took his bachelor's degree, and in 1807 that of M.A. Having entered holy orders, he somewhat later accepted an assistant mastership at Eton College, from which position he was removed to the rectory of Maple-Durham, Oxfordshire; and while discharging the duties of this cure, published his "Treatise on the Records of the Creation," which not only gained the Burnet prize, but excited considerable general attention at the time. In 1820 he was appointed canon of Durham, and eight years later, being then just forty-eight years of age, he became bishop of Chester. In this post Dr. Sumner remained till 1843, when, on the death of Dr. Howley, he was raised to the archiepiscopal chair of Canterbury, an appointment which, from the new primate being comparatively a little-known man in connexion with ecclesiastical affairs, excited some surprise. The appointment, however, was fully justified by the judicious and conciliatory course pursued by the archbishop. Besides the work already mentioned, Dr. Sumner at various times published the following:—"Apostolic Preaching Considered," "Charges at Chester," "Evidences of Christianity," "Expository Lectures," in nine volumes; "Four Sermons on the Christian Ministry," "Sermons on Christian Charity," "Sermons on the Christian Faith," "Sermons on the Festivals," n. 1780; p. 1802.

SUNDERLAND, Henry Spencer, first Earl of sun-der-land, an English nobleman, who distinguished himself in defending the cause of Charles I. against the Parliament. Before he had attained his majority, he married the beautiful Dorothy Sidney, sister of Algernon Sidney, and the Sacerdissa of the poet Waller. At the outbreak of the civil war, he joined the king's standard. He, however, had no real sympathy with the royal cause, and declared, in a letter to his wife, "If there could be an excellent found to save the punctilio of honour, I would not remain here an hour." In 1613 he was created earl of Sunderland by Charles I., in reward, it is asserted, of having helped that monarch with a loan of £15,000. He fell in the first battle of Newbury. Clarendon, the royalist historian, thus speaks of him: "He was a lord of great fortune, tender years (being not above three-and-twenty years of age), and an early judgment, who, having no command in the army, attended upon the king's person, under the obligation of honour; and putting himself that day in the king's troop, as volunteer, before they came to charge, was taken away by a cannon-bullet." n. 1620; killed, 1643.

SUNDERLAND, Robert Spencer, Earl of, an English statesman, was the son of the preceding, and commenced his public career in 1671, on being appointed ambassador to Spain. He subsequently fulfilled the same functions at the court of France, and afterwards became secretary of state for foreign affairs. Under the reign of James II. he rose to the height of power as president of the council and prime minister, and, in order to retain the king's favour, became a Roman Catholic, or, at least, put on the semblance of it. Accordingly, he became so unpopular with the nation, that James was compelled to dismiss him; a change which, it is said, "pleased all men; but it came too late." On the accession of William III., Sunderland retired to Holland, where he remained during two years; but, to the general surprise, he was recalled at the end of that period, and taken into favour by the new monarch. He was not intrusted with office for several years; but it was well known that he acted as chief adviser to William. In 1695 he was appointed lord chamberlain, and remained at the head of the government during two years, after which he retired into private life. The secret of this statesman's success—of his being employed by James II. and his supplanter William III.—was, undoubtedly, his great talents for the conduct of public affairs. "He had, indeed," says Bishop Burnet, "the superior genius to all the men of business that I have known." n. either 1641 or 1642; p. at Althorp, 1702.

SURREY, Thomas Howard, Earl of, suri-re, a gallant English nobleman, who served with his brother, Sir Edward Howard, against Sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate, who infested the English coast in 1511. After the defeat and death of Barton, Surrey accompanied the marquis of Dorset in his expedition to Guienne, which ended in the conquest of Navarre by Ferdinand. On the death of his brother, Sir Edward, he was made high-admiral of England, and effectually cleared the Channel of the French cruisers. The victory of Flodden-field, in which the king of Scotland was slain, was chiefly owing to his bravery. For these services his father was restored to the title of duke of Norfolk, and himself created earl of Surrey. On the breaking out of the disturbances in Ireland, he was appointed lieutenant of that kingdom, where he suppressed the rebellion. After serving there two years, he returned, and had the command of the fleet against France. He succeeded to the title of duke of Norfolk on the death of his father in 1524. Notwithstanding his great services, Henry, at the close of life, caused the duke to be sent to the Tower on a charge of treason, and his son to be beheaded in his presence. The death of the tyrant only saved the duke's life. p. 1554.

SURREY, Henry Howard, Earl of, an accomplished English nobleman and poet, son of the preceding, was at first, while his friend the duke of Richmond, natural son of Henry VIII., was alive, a favourite at court; but after serving his country with great valour, he fell a victim to the jealousy of Henry VIII., who pretended to suspect him of treasonable designs against himself. He and his father were sent to the Tower, and the son beheaded on Tower-hill, in 1547. He wrote some excellent poems, and made a beautiful translation of a portion of the "Æneid." He is the first English writer of blank verse.

SUSARION, su-sair-i-on, the most ancient of the Greek tragic poets. He took his subjects from history, and flourished about 550 B.C.

SUSSEX, Duke of. (See AUGUSTUS FREDERICK.)

SUTTON, Thomas, sut-ton, the founder of the Charter-house, was educated at Eton College, and studied the law at Lincoln's Inn, but never followed that profession. Having purchased some estates in the county of Durham, he discovered coal-mines there, which produced him immense wealth. He also gained a large fortune by commerce and marriage. On the death of his wife in 1602, he led a retired life; and, having no issue, purchased the Charter-house, which he erected into an hospital and seminary of learning. n. in Lincolnshire, 1532; p. in London, 1611.

subordinate grades, became a colonel in 1762. He displayed the greatest bravery when serving under Romanzoff against the Turks, and having slain several janissaries with his own hand, he put their heads into a sack, which he laid at the feet of his general. In 1793 he compelled the Tartars of Kuban and Dudziak to submit and swear allegiance to the empress; for which he was named general-in-chief. In 1797 he defeated the Turks at Oczakow, which place was taken by storm. In 1799 he attacked the Mussulmans with a very inferior force, and defeated them, near the river Rymnik, for which he was created a count of the Roman empire, and obtained the surname of Rymnikski. By this victory he saved the Prince of Saxe-Coburg and the Imperial army. In the following year he stormed Ismail, wherein above 30,000 Turks were either killed or wounded, and 10,000 taken prisoners. Always laconic, he announced his success to the empress as follows: "Praise be to God, and praise be to you; the fortress is taken, and I am in it." Indeed, he was wont to observe that the pen was not a fit instrument for a soldier. In December, 1791, peace was concluded, and Suwaroff was loaded with honours. His talents were again called into action in the war of Poland, when he took Prague, where 30,000 Poles fell on the field of battle. This was followed by the fall of Warsaw, and the partition of Poland. For these services he was made field-marshal, and obtained the grant of a large estate. When the emperor Paul entered into the war against France, in 1799, Suwaroff had the command of the army, with which he marched into Italy, where he was opposed by Moreau. Overpowered by numbers, the Russian hero effected a most brilliant retreat over the mountains of Switzerland, and, entering Germany, marched to Russia by order of his sovereign. For his services in this campaign, he was created a prince by the title of Italinsky. He was, however, treated by Paul with great ingratitude, which is supposed to have deeply affected his spirit. He was held in the greatest respect by his soldiers, and, although he showed himself a brilliant tactician, he used to say that the whole of his system was comprised in the words, "Advance and strike." He was one of the few generals who never lost a battle. b. in Finland, 1730; d. at St. Petersburg, 1800.

SWAIN, Charles, swain, a modern English writer, known as "the Manchester Poet," was educated for commercial pursuits; but after spending fourteen years in the office of his uncle, the proprietor of large dye-works, he abandoned commerce to acquire the art of engraving, which he afterwards practised as a profession. His first essay in poetry was made in 1828, at which time he produced a collection of lyrics, upon subjects of history and imagination. His later works were, "Beauties of the Mind," "Dryburgh Abbey, an Elegy upon the Death of Sir Walter Scott," "English Melodies," "Dramatic Chapters," and "Rhymes for Childhood." To evince their respect for him, his fellow-townsmen presented him with a testimonial. b. at Manchester, 1803.

SWAINSON, William, swain-son, an eminent modern English naturalist, who also travelled in various parts of the globe, and made a large collection of objects in natural history. He was a voluminous writer, his principal works being, "Zoological Illustrations,"

Swedenborg

"The Naturalist's Guide," several volumes upon natural history for "Larner's Cyclopaedia," "Habits and Instincts of Animals," "History and Natural Arrangement of Insects," and a treatise on the "Natural History and Classification of Birds." In 1841 he emigrated with his family to New Zealand, where he continued to reside. b. about the commencement of the present century.

SWAMMERDAM, John, swan-mer-dam, a celebrated Dutch naturalist, who was educated at Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree in medicine in 1667. He applied himself with great assiduity to the study of anatomy and of insects. In 1667, while pursuing a course of dissection at the hospital at Amsterdam, he invented a method of injecting the blood-vessels with a waxen liquid, which afterwards became solid; also a thermometer to ascertain the degree of heat in animals. Towards the close of his life, he embraced the mysterious doctrines of Antoinette Bourignon. His principal works are, "Treatise on Respiration," "General History of Insects," "The Anatomy of the Bee-Fly," which latter cost him ten years of incessant application; and a treatise upon the "Natural History of Bees," which, says Bachman, "all ages, from the commencement of natural history, have produced nothing to value."

into the possession of Boerhaave, who published them; but his museum was disposed of to various purchasers. The "History of Insects" has been translated into English by The Floyd. b. at Amsterdam, 1637; d. 1680.

SWEDENBORG, Emmanuel, swed-en-borg, a Swedish mystic, and founder of a sect, whose father was a bishop of the Lutheran persuasion, and president of the Swedish churches. In 1710 he set out upon a course of travel, which embraced England, France, and Holland; and at his return to Sweden was appointed assessor of the College of Mines, which office he held till 1747. He was ennobled in 1719. His scientific pursuits were highly honourable to him, and he published several excellent works, the principal of which was the "Regnum Minerale," printed at Leipsic in 1734. He also wrote a treatise on the "Position and Course of the Planets," and another on the tides. At length he abstracted himself from those studies, imagining "that he belonged to the Society of Angels, in which things spiritual and heavenly are the only subjects of discourse and entertainment." Filled with this notion, he put forth a number of mystical books on the New Jerusalem; on Heaven and Hell; Spiritual Influx; the White Horse in the Revelation, &c. His opinions obtained little notice in his lifetime, but after his death they produced a sect; and several conventicles were established in London and elsewhere, called New-Jerusalem Temples, in which the memory of Swedenborg is respected as that of a prophet. There is also in London a society for the express purpose of printing and circulating his works. The tenets of this sect are, that there is one God, who is no other than Jesus Christ, and that he "always existed in a human form; that for the sake of redeeming the world he took upon himself a proper human or material body, but not a human soul; that this redemption consists in bringing the hells or evil spirits into subjection, and the heavens into order and regulation. . . . they hold that there is but one God and one divine person, they maintain that in this person there is a real trinity, consisting of the divinity, the humanity, and the operation of them both in the Lord Jesus. They believe that there are angels attending upon men, residing in their affections; that temptation consists in a struggle between good and bad angels within men." SWIFT, Jonathan, swift, a celebrated divine and writer. His father, who held the appointment of steward of the King's Inns, Dublin, died a few months before the birth of Jonathan, leaving his widow in narrow circumstances. At the age of 6 years the child was sent to Kilkenny school, whence, in 1683, he was removed to the university of Dublin, the expense of his education being defrayed by his uncle. While at college, he paid more attention to history and poetry than to logic and the classics; so that he was denied his degree on his first application, and obtained it with difficulty on the second. At the death of his uncle, in 1688, he went to England, where he was hospitably entertained by Sir William Temple, who had married a relation of his mother. During his residence with Sir William, who employed him as his private secretary, he formed the resolution of embracing the ecclesiastical life, and having taken his M.A. degree, he was ordained, and obtained the prebend of Kilroot, in the diocese of Connor, worth about £100 a year. Disappointed of preferment in England, he accompanied the earl of Berkeley, one of the lords justices of Ireland, as his chaplain and private secretary; but he was again disappointed, and dismissed with the livings of Laracor and Rathbeggan, and the rectory of Augher, instead of the deanery of Derry, which had been promised him. He then settled at Laracor, where he rebuilt the parsonage-house, repaired the church, and discharged his parochial duties in an exemplary manner. About this time, Miss Esther Johnson, the celebrated Stella, came to reside near him. She was afterwards secretly married to Swift; but the latter would never acknowledge her as his wife; in consequence of which she broke her heart. This amiable woman was the daughter of Sir William Temple's steward, and had been bequeathed a small independence by that gentleman. At the accession of Queen Anne, Swift embarked in politics, in hopes of preferment in England, which he again missed, but in 1713 was promoted to the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The death of Queen Anne closed all his prospects, and completely embittered his temper. He was for some time very unpopular in Dublin, but came at last to be revered as an oracle. One Wood projected a coinage of £108,000 Irish farthings and halfpence, for which he obtained a patent. Swift immediately addressed a series of letters to the people, under the signature of "M. B. Drapier," urging them not to receive this base coin; and so successful was he, that the patent was withdrawn. After the death of Stella, in 1725, he led a very retired life, and wasted much of his time on literary trifles, which were unworthy of his pen. In 1736 he was attacked with a dangerous illness, and subsequently led an almost secluded life. His ill-treatment of Stella having been mentioned, it is necessary to notice his conduct to the lady celebrated in his works under the appellation of Vanessa. She was the daughter of Mr. Vanhomrigh, a Dutch merchant, and had conceived a strong affection for the dean, which he seems to have encouraged. Swift left the greatest part of his property for the purpose of endowing an hospital for lunatics at Dublin. The poetical pieces of Swift are mostly of a humorous order, and some of them are somewhat coarse. His prose style is remarkably clear and forcible. His principal works are, a satirical romance, called "Gulliver's Travels;" the allegory of "A Tale of a Tub," in which he ridicules Popery and Puritanism; and "Political Tracts against the Whigs." B. at Dublin, 1667; d. 1745.

SWINBURNE, Algernon Charles, swin'-burn, a modern English poet, possessed of undoubted genius, though in many of his poems, his choice of subjects, and mode of treatment are objectionable. His finest work is, "Atalanta in Calydon." B. at Holmwood, near Henley-on-Thames, 1833.

SYDENHAM, Thomas, sîd-en-ham, an eminent English physician, who, in 1642, entered at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, but left that seat of learning when it became a garrison for Charles I. He subsequently returned to the university, and, after taking his doctor's degree, settled in Westminster, and became the first physician of his time. Dr. Sydenham was the first who introduced the cool treatment of the small-pox; and his writings on consumption, fevers, and nervous diseases, though brief, are universally esteemed. The best edition of his writings is that of Dr. Swan. B. in Dorsetshire, 1624; d. in London, 1689.

SYDENHAM, Floyer, a learned English critic, who translated some of the works of Plato into English, and was distinguished as much by his modesty and the gentleness of his manners as his erudition. He died under arrest for a trifling debt, contracted at an eating-house; a circumstance which gave rise to the founding of the literary fund for the benefit of authors in distress. B. 1710; d. 1788.

THOMPSON, Charles Edward Poulett Thompson, Lord, governor-general of Canada, was the son of Mr. J. Poulett Thompson, a London merchant, and when about twenty, became resident in St. Petersburg as the correspondent of his father's firm; and, until his accession to public office in 1830, continued to be engaged in mercantile affairs. His political life commenced in 1823, when he was elected M.P. for Dover; but in 1830 being returned for both Dover and Manchester, he gave preference to the latter. On the formation of the Reform cabinet, he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade and treasurer of the navy; became president of the board of trade in 1834; and in 1839 succeeded Lord Durham as governor-general of Canada. In 1840 her Majesty conferred on him the peerage of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Sydenham of Toronto. Under his administration Canada was gradually increasing in prosperity, but he did not live to carry into execution many measures which he had contemplated; for, whilst riding near Kingston, he met with an accident by the falling of his horse, and died Sept. 12, 1841. B. 1799.

limited means; but upon the death of the courtesan Nicopolis, who left him her fortune, as did also his stepmother, he was enabled to put himself forward as a candidate for those high places in the republic of Rome to which his birth and accomplishments entitled him. He joined the army under Marius, and accompanied him to Numidia as questor; but his military talents exciting the jealousy of that general, he left him, and entered the army of Lutatius Catulus. Being chosen prætor in 83 B.C., he was appointed to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, which he effected. He afterwards terminated the war with the Marsi, for which he was rewarded with the consular dignity. He now aspired to the title of perpetual dictator; but met with a powerful opponent in Marius. However, after putting an end to the war with Mithridates, and conquering Greece, he entered Rome in triumph, and put to death all whom he considered as inimical to his ambitious views. The streets of Rome were filled with dead bodies, and those to whom he had promised pardon were inhumanly massacred. After ruling tyrannically, and altering the laws according to his own humour, Sylla, in 79 B.C., voluntarily resigned the dictatorship, and retired to his estate at Puteoli, where he spent the remainder of his days in debauchery with some of the most vicious of the common people. He wrote the "Memoirs of his own Life," which are lost. They are supposed, however, to have been made use of by Plutarch. B. 133 B.C.; D. 79 B.C.

SYLVESTER, Joshua, sil-ves-ter, an English poet, who became a merchant adventurer, and was in great esteem with Queen Elizabeth and King James. Prince Henry, son of the last monarch, appointed him his poet-pensioner. He wrote poems, translated into English verse Du Bartas's "Divine Weeks and Works," and some pieces from Frænestorius. B. 1563; D. in Holland, 1618.

SYLVIVS, Eneas. (See PIUS II.)

SYMMACHUS, Quintus Aurelius, sym-ma-chus, præfect of Rome, and consul in 391, displayed great zeal for the re-establishment of paganism, but was opposed by St. Ambrose, and banished by the emperor Theodosius. A collection of his epistles is extant. Lived in the 4th century.

SYNCELLUS, George, sin-sel-lus, a monk of Constantinople, who wrote a history of the world from the Creation down to the reign of Diocletian, which he entitled "Chronography." It is valuable as furnishing a knowledge of the dynasties of Egypt. Flourished towards the close of the 7th century.

SYRAX, si-fax, king of part of Numidia, who entered into an alliance with the Romans against the Carthaginians at the beginning of the second Punic war; but having espoused the daughter of Hasdrubal, he joined Carthage. He was defeated by Masinissa and Lælius, and conducted in triumph to Rome, where he died in prison, 201 B.C.

SZE-MA-KWANG, se-ma-kwang, an eminent Chinese historian, who became public censor and historiographer to the emperor Jin-Tsung. He wrote a history of China upon the model of that of his great ancestor, Sze-ma-tseen. (See the following.) A translation of a poem by this author, entitled "The Garden," is given in M. Hue's "Chinese Empire." His great ability was recognised by his sovereign, and he rose to be prime-minister. In 1267, his name, inscribed as the "Prince of Literature," was put up in the temple of Confucius. His great work has been translated into French by Maillet, and entitled "The Universal Mirror for Rulers,—A History of the Chinese Empire." B. about 1015; D. 1096.

SZE-MA-TSEEN, se-ma-tseen, a celebrated Chinese historian, who composed a work entitled "Sze-ke," which embraced the annals of China from 2937 B.C. until about 100 B.C. Remusat, the famous French scholar, praises this work for the "multitude of facts which it contains, the neat and lively manner in which they are related, and the constant simplicity and unbroken dignity of the style." B. about 115 B.C.; D. about 80 B.C.

TABARI, Abu Jaafar Mahomet surnamed, ta-ba-re, a celebrated Arabian historian, who produced a history of the world from the Creation to 915. He likewise composed a treatise upon Mohammedan law, and a commentary upon the Koran. His history has been translated into French, Persian, and Latin. B. at Amol, Talaristan, 839; D. at Dardad, 923.

TABERNEMONTANTUS, Jacobus Theodorus, ta-ber-na-mont-tai-nus, a German physician and botanist, who became physician to the Bishop of Spire, and to John Casimir, elector-palatine. In 1583 he produced the first part of his work entitled "The New Herbal." He likewise wrote a treatise upon mineral waters. B. about 1520; D. 1590.

TACFARINAS, ta-fa-rina-sin, a Numidian chieftain, who commanded an army against the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had formerly served in the Roman legions. After he had defeated several of the generals of Tiberius, he was killed in a battle with Dolabella, B.C. 25.

TACHFIN, or TAXFIN, Abou Omar, tach-fin, the last Almoravid king of Cordova, who, during twelve years, sustained a struggle against the Christians in Spain. He succeeded his father in 1143; but perished by drowning three years later, while going to the succour of Oran.

TACITUS, Caius Cornelius, tae-ti-tus, a celebrated Roman historian, of whose family or early life nothing is known. His first employment is said by some to have been as procurator to Vespasian in Belgic Gaul. He himself states that he was first promoted to a high post by Vespasian. Under Domitian he filled the office of prætor, and that of consul under

N. 97. He displayed great eloquence at the bar, and is spoken of by Pliny the Younger as the greatest orator of his time. It is, however, as an historian that he has acquired immortality. Of his histories, which originally comprised the period from the accession of Galba to the death of Domitian, only a part remains. His "Annals" were the most important of his works; but of these we have, unfortunately, lost a valuable portion. The "Treatise on the Manners of the Germans," and the "Life" of his father-in-law Agricola, are perfect, and cannot be too highly admired; but his "History of the Reign of Tiberius" may be considered as his masterpiece. His Latin is remarkable for its purity and elegance; and his greatest strength lay in portraying character. His friendship with Pliny is proverbial. The English translations of Tacitus are those of Henry Savile, Murphy, and Gordon. One of the best editions of the original is that of Bekker, Leipzig, 1831, which contains the notes of Lipsius, who stands at the head of all the modern commentators upon Tacitus. B. about 54; D. it is supposed about 110.

Tacitus

TACITUS, Marcus Claudius, a Roman emperor, who was elected by the senate after the death of Aurelian, in 275. He displayed great wisdom in the administration of justice and the government of the state. He also instituted some excellent regulations for the reformation of the public morals; and also restored the senate to its ancient dignity. Tacitus was likewise distinguished as a warrior. He repelled the Gothic barbarians who had invaded the Roman territories; and was preparing for a war against Persia, when he died in Cilicia, of a violent disorder, though, according to some, he was assassinated, A.D. 276. B. 203.

TACQUET, Andrew, ta'-ket, a celebrated Dutch mathematician, who held the appointment of professor in the college of the Jesuits for fifteen years. He was the author of a treatise on astronomy and several important works on mathematics. B. at Antwerp, 1611; D. 1660.

TAFEL, Andrew, taf'-fe, an Italian painter, who first introduced into his native country the art of painting in mosaic. This knowledge he acquired from some Greek artists who were engaged in executing mosaics at the church of St. Mark, Venice. With Apollonius, one of the best of these Greek artists, he entered into a close friendship, and together they produced some remarkable works, one of the best-known of which is that entitled the "Dead Christ," at Florence. B. at Florence, 1213; D. 1294.

TALBERT, Francis Xavier, tail'-bair, a French writer, who was educated for the law, which he renounced for the ecclesiastical state, and obtained a canonry. His works are, "Discourse on the Inequality among Men," (this was crowned by the Academy of Dijon, in 1755), "Panegyric on St. Louis," elegies upon Bonnet, Montaigne, Cardinal d'Amboise, Chancellor de l'Hôpital, Philip, regent of France, and Boileau. He also wrote some poems. B. at Besançon, 1728; D. at Lemberg, 1803.

TALBOT, John, Earl of Shrewsbury, tal'-bot, displayed great valour in the reduction of Ireland, where he was sent in 1414, as commander-in-chief, by Henry V. Subsequently he went to France, and served under the duke of Bedford. In conjunction with the earl of Salisbury, he conducted the siege of Orleans, which he was, however, compelled to raise in 1429, by Jeanne Darc. At the battle of Patay he was made prisoner; but recovered his liberty not long afterwards. He was for some time again in Ireland, and on his return to France gained several victories, and took some strong places; so that his name became a terror to the French. He was slain at the siege of Châtillon, 1453. B. in Shropshire, 1373.

TALBOT, William, an English prelate, who was, through the interest of his relative the earl of Shrewsbury, preferred to the deanery of Worcester in 1891, and in 1899 to the bishopric of Oxford. In 1715 he was translated to Salisbury, and in 1721 to Durham. His sermons have been published in 1 vol. B. at Lechfield, about 1680; D. 1730.

TALBOT, Charles, Lord, chancellor of Great Britain, was the son of the preceding. He was an excellent lawyer, and a man of high virtue and public integrity. B. 1684; D. 1737.

TALBOR, Charles, Earl, and afterwards Duke of Shrewsbury, was one of the first promoters of the Revolution, for which he was created a duke, and made lord chamberlain, viceroy of Ireland, and high treasurer. B. 1690; D. in London, 1718.

TALBOT, William Henry Fox, a modern English writer, and the discoverer of the process of obtaining pictures upon paper by the action of light, called at first the Talbotype, but which was afterwards, together with other inventions, merged in the general term of Photography. In 1833, while engaged in obtaining drawings of the scenery upon the Lake of Como, by the aid of the camera-lucida, he was, in his own words, "led to reflect on the inimitable beauty of the pictures of Nature's painting, which the glass lens of the camera throws upon the paper in its focus," and upon the possibility of rendering these images permanent. Possessing some chemical knowledge, he was aware of the fact that paper could, by chemical agency, be rendered sensitive to the action of the sun's rays. Starting from this basis, he made a large number of carefully-planned experiments, and succeeded to an extent sufficiently satisfactory; but not wishing to make known his discovery before he had brought it to maturity, he delayed its publication until he saw the notification of the invention of the Daguerreotype given to the world. (See DAGUERRE.) This event, he stated, "in some degree frustrated the hope with which he had pursued, during nearly five years, this long and complicated but interesting series of experiments,—the hope, namely, of being the first to announce to the world the existence of the new art which has since been named Photography." There was, however, between the two processes, this difference,—Daguerre obtained sun-pictures upon metal plates, and Mr. Fox Talbot upon paper, both mediums being previously rendered sensitive to the action of light by chemical means. Again, both the French and the English inventor had only followed up a principle which had been previously announced by other chemists. These gentlemen were, however, the first to give a practical application to the principle. Daguerre completed his researches by the year 1839; but it was not until September, 1840, that Mr. Talbot brought his process to any great degree of perfection. He secured his invention by patent, and granted licences to those who desired to make use of the process for commercial purposes. The new art was so greatly improved and extended by fresh discoveries, and so widely employed by private persons, that it was found necessary to induce Mr. Fox Talbot to surrender some portions of his patent, which in the interests of science and art that gentleman did. He continued his experiments, and greatly contributed to bring the art of photography to that point of perfection which it subsequently attained. He likewise gave an account of some experiments relative to the engraving of steel plates by means of photography. In this art, however, very much more satisfactory results were obtained by M. Niépce de St. Victor. (See NIEPCE DE SAINT VICTOR.) Mr. Talbot, at a subsequent date, made some attempts at deciphering Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions. He was the author, among other works, of "Hermes, or Classical

TALFOURD, Sir Thomas Noon, täl'-ford, a modern English judge and writer, received his education under Dr. Valpy, at the grammar school of Reading, in which town his father carried on the business of a brewer. In his 18th year he was sent to London, and placed under the celebrated special pleader Chitty, to acquire a knowledge of the law. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1821. By assiduous application he rose in his profession, becoming a serjeant-at-law and recorder of Danbury. He was returned to Parliament by the borough of Reading in 1835, and retained his seat until 1841. He was returned by the same constituency in 1847; but resigned his seat in 1849, upon being appointed a judge in the court of Common Pleas. While in Parliament, he introduced two important measures,—the Custody of Infants' Act and the Copyright Act. In literature he likewise laboured industriously. During several years he reported circuit cases for the "Times" newspaper, and was a contributor to the "New Monthly Magazine," the "Edinburgh" and "Quarterly" reviews, and the "Law Magazine." In 1836 his tragedy of "Ion" was acted at Covent Garden Theatre. At a later period he produced "The Athenian Captive," "Glencoe; or the Fate of the MacDonalds;" and "The Castilian," tragedies, the last of which was not placed upon the stage.

noses had been so restored. In modern days, his mode of operating has been superseded by the "Indian method," in which the skin for the new nose is taken from the forehead. There was formerly a statue of Taliacotius in the lecture-room at Bologna, representing him with a nose in his hand. B. at Bologna, 1516; p. 1599.

TALIESIN, tal-e-sin', the most celebrated of the Welsh bards. Many of his compositions are printed in the "Archæology of Wales." Flourished in the 6th century.

TALLART, Camille d'Hostun, Duke de, tal'-art, marshal of France, who served under Louis XIV. in Holland, in 1672, and displayed such talents and bravery, that Turenne gave him a distinguished command at the battles of Mulhausen and Turbheim. In 1693 he was made lieutenant-general, and in 1695 was sent as ambassador to England, to negotiate as to the succession to the crown of Spain. Upon the war of the Spanish succession breaking out, Tallart was placed in command of the army of the Rhine, in 1702, and the year following, was made marshal of France. In the same year he gained a great victory over the elector of Hesse, near Spire. On that occasion he wrote to Louis XIV., that "he had taken more colours and standards than his majesty had lost soldiers." In 1704 he was signally defeated at Blenheim, by the duke of Marlborough, taken prisoner, and conveyed to England, where he remained during seven years. On his return to France, in 1712, he was created a duke, and in 1726 was nominated minister of state. B. in Dauphiny, 1632; p. 1723.

TALLEYRAND, täl-le-ränd, the name of a younger branch of an ancient and distinguished family of Perigord. The first who bore the name was Helie de Talleyrand, who lived about 1100. The most celebrated members of this family were:—

TALLEYRAND-PERIGORD, Helie de, a French Cardinal, who took a prominent part in the election of the four popes, Benedict XII., Clement VI., Innocent VI., and Urban V. He was employed upon several important affairs by the pontifical court, and was sent to London to negotiate a truce between England and France, and also to procure the release of John, king of the latter country. He was the contemporary and friend of Petrarch. B. 1301; p. 1364.

TALLEYRAND-PERIGORD, Henry de, Count de Chalais, was the favourite of Louis XIII., and the lover of the duchess de Chevreuse. He behaved with bravery at the sieges of Montpellier and Montauban; but having engaged in a conspiracy against Richelieu, he was condemned to death, and perished upon the scaffold in 1626.

TALLEYRAND-PERIGORD, Alexandre Angélique, became archbishop of Rheims in 1777, in which office he evinced great administrative talent and liberality. He was sent as deputy to the States-general; but subsequently emigrated, and, while in exile, attached himself to the Count de Provence, afterwards Louis XVIII. In 1817 he was preferred to the cardinalate and archbishopric of Paris. B. at Paris, 1736; p. at the same city, 1822.

TALLEYRAND-PERIGORD, Charles Maurice de, a celebrated French diplomatist, who, when only a year old, was rendered lame for life in consequence of a fall. Thus precluded from following a military career, which, as the eldest son of a noble family, he considered as his birthright, he was educated for the priesthood Life;" "Final Memorials of Charles Lamb;" "Vacation Rambles and Thoughts, comprising the Recollections of Three Continental Tours;" and a "Supplement to the Vacation Rambles." In 1844 he was nominated D.C.L. of the university of Oxford. He had the reputation of being an eloquent advocate, sound lawyer, and upright judge. Within a distinguished literary and legal circle, his social qualities and amiable disposition caused him to be both loved and respected. The manner of his death was painfully sudden. While charging the grand jury at the opening of the Stafford assizes, he was observed to falter, and almost immediately afterwards his head fell forward upon his breast. On being removed from the court, it was found that he had breathed his last. B. near Stafford, 1795; p. 1854.

TALIAECOTIUS, or TAGLIACOTZI, Gaspar, täl'-ya-kot'-se, a celebrated Italian professor of medicine and surgery at Bologna. He is famous as having first employed the Taliacotian operation by which he was enabled to restore lost noses. He described the theory of this operation in a work entitled "De Curtorum Chirurgia per Insitionem," published after his death at Venice. According to the method there explained, a portion of the skin taken from the upper arm was grafted upon the seat of the former nose, by a long series of painful operations. Some writers assert that Taliacotius could never have practised what he taught; but, on the other hand, several witnesses have left on record statements to the effect that they either saw the surgical feat performed, or knew persons whose at the College d'Harcourt, and afterwards at the Sorbonne. Until his 20th year he had been neglected by his parents, who appear to have been inspired with some unnatural aversion to their crippled son, and was introduced as the Abbé de Perigord at the coronation festivities of Louis XVI. in 1774. His great latent abilities had been assiduously cultivated, and his witty conversational style, formed upon the model of Voltaire and Fontenelle, shone forth even among the brilliant talkers to be found in the Parisian society of that day. In his 26th year he was appointed general agent—the minister of state—of the Gallic church. In this important office he remained during eight years, being then preferred to the bishopric of Autun. This occurred in 1783, and with it commenced his political career. He acted as a member of the States-general, convoked in the following year. At this period he adopted almost entirely those revolutionary principles which were so rife in his native country. He supported Mirabeau, advocated the sale of the church lands and the secularization of education; finally, he renounced his bishopric, and cast away for ever the ecclesiastical character which he had so much against his own inclination been driven to assume. The Constitutional Monarchy party desiring to maintain peace with England, selected Talleyrand as the only man fitted to execute the delicate commission of opening negotiations with the court of St. James's. He was sent to London in 1792, as the colleague of Chauvelin, the nominal ambassador; but finding himself unable to effect anything towards creating an understanding between the English court and the French peace party, he shortly afterwards returned to Paris. Upon the fall of the French monarchy, he, with some difficulty, quitted Paris, and repairing to London, supported himself there by the proceeds derived from the sale of his library. Strongly disliked by the English government, he was in a short time ordered to leave the country. He sailed for the United States, and remained there until 1796, when he was recalled to France, through the influence of Madame de Staël. Under the Directory he was appointed minister for foreign affairs. After Napoleon's return from Egypt, Talleyrand, with great political foresight, attached himself to the fortunes of the future emperor. Napoleon appears to have understood Talleyrand from the time of their first interview, after the latter had been reinstated as foreign minister. "Talleyrand is a dexterous fellow," Napoleon is reported to have said; "he has seen through me." While Talleyrand acted as foreign minister, the fortunes of his master were in the ascendant. The concordat with the pope, which paved the way for the empire; the treaties of Luneville, Amiens, of Presburg, and of Tilsit, were principally the work of the ex-bishop of Autun. In reward of these services, Napoleon created his minister Prince of Benevento and vice-grand elector of the empire. Nevertheless the two ambitious men were fast being estranged from each other. Talleyrand was deprived of the portfolio of foreign affairs in 1807; in 1809 the ex-minister expressed himself so unreservedly in condemnation of the expedition to Spain, that Napoleon commanded him to resign the office of chamberlain. From that time Talleyrand kept aloof from the court, and it is said predicted the speedy fall of the empire.

At the capitulation of Paris in 1814, Talleyrand again appeared as a public man. The emperor Alexander took up his residence in his house, and Talleyrand used the opportunity to acquire over the Russian potentate a strong degree of influence. He was appointed minister of foreign affairs by Louis XVIII., and was chosen as the representative of his native country at the congress of Vienna; but after the Hundred Days he lost the favour of the restored Bourbons; and during the interval between the peace of Paris and the Revolution of 1830, he occupied the position of leader of the liberal and constitutional party, and indeed was regarded as an opponent to the elder branch of the Bourbons. When, in 1830, France became a constitutional monarchy under Louis Philippe, Talleyrand was nominated ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James's, which post he retained until 1835. During this interval he sought, by every possible means, to bring about that alliance between England and France, as constitutional governments, which had been the wish of his whole life. He likewise signed the quadruple alliance of England, France, Spain, and Portugal, and assisted in the establishment of the kingdom of Belgium. On relinquishing his ambassadorial functions, he retired into private life. Talleyrand was unquestionably one of the greatest men of his time; to a great talent for business, he added that perfect command over himself which is so advantageous to a diplomatist. His wit was caustic, ready, and penetrating, a crowd of examples attesting his accomplishments in this respect. He preserved all the qualities of his great mind until the close of his life. He has been charged with inconsistency, because he served under governments so different in their principles; but if it be admitted that, as some eminent authorities declare, he had always the welfare of his country at heart, it may be conceded that he was ever actuated by noble aims, although he chose various modes of executing his ideas. He left in manuscript "Memoirs" of his life. n. at Paris, 1754; p. 1833.

TALLIEN, Jean Lambert, tal'-le-ā, a celebrated French revolutionary leader, who produced the overthrow of Robespierre. He was engaged as a reader and corrector of the press in the printing-office of the "Moniteur" when the States-general were convoked; and, having brought out a small newspaper called the "Citizen's Friend," in which the court and monarchy were violently denounced, he came to be regarded as a patriot by the excited populace. Becoming a member of the Jacobin Club, he soon rose to great influence. He supported Danton in all his sanguinary measures, and was one of the most violent persecutors of Louis XVI., for whose death he voted. In 1793 he was sent by the Convention to Bordeaux, where, during several months, he consigned hundreds to the scaffold. In 1794 he was recalled to Paris, and narrowly escaped the fate of his patron, Danton. Contriving, however, to ingratiate himself into favour with Robespierre, he was elected president of the Convention. In this position he worked secretly for the overthrow of the dictator; but Robespierre, detecting his schemes, denounced him in the Convention. Tallien nevertheless contrived to save himself by working upon the fears of the Convention, whom he declared it was the intention of Robespierre to proscribe. This proved so successful, that Tallien was supported by the greater number of the revolutionists, and was in a position to denounce Robespierre, who, with his colleagues, perished. He subsequently became a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and in 1795 was sent as commissioner to the army under Hoche. He went to Egypt in 1798; but was in 1801 dismissed, and sent back to France. He then fell into great distress, which was relieved by Fouché's appointing him consul at Alicante. At the Restoration he lost this post; and, though one of the régicides, was allowed to live in Paris, where he died miserably poor, in 1820.

TALLIS, Thomas, tāl'-lis, an eminent English musician, who was gentleman of the chapel to Edward VI. and Queen Mary, and his salary is said to have been sevenpence-halfpenny a-day. In the reign of Elizabeth he was appointed organist, in conjunction with his former pupil Bird, with whom he published a collection of hymns for church service. b. about 1529; d. 1585.

TALMA, François Joseph, tāl'-ma, a celebrated French tragedian, who made his first attempt upon the stage in his 20th year, which was pronounced a failure. He thereupon resumed the practice of the dental art, for which he had been educated. Four years subsequently he made another appearance as an actor; and, after two years' application to his new profession, succeeded in winning universal approbation. He advanced rapidly, until he was acknowledged to be the best tragic actor in France. The first to perform the part of Titus in a Roman toga, he shortly afterwards carried out a total reform in stage costume. The emperor Napoleon I., and subsequently Louis XVIII. presented him with many flattering marks of their esteem; and during his last illness the audiences at the Théâtre Français required each evening to be informed of his condition before the performance was allowed to begin. He was pronounced as without a rival in seventy-one characters; among which were Coriolanus, Macbeth, Hamlet, Othello, Sylla, Cæsar, and Nero. While a child he had spent about eight years in England, and had thus acquired the elements of the English language, in which he subsequently improved himself until he spoke it perfectly. The friend of John Kemble, he went to London in order to be present at the farewell performance of that actor. b. at Paris, 1763; d. at the same city, 1826.

TALMELANE. (See TEMUR.)

TANAQUIL, or CATA CECILIA, tân'-a-quil, wife of Tarquin, fifth king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, and so well skilled in augury that she persuaded her husband to go to Rome, where he was elected king. After he was murdered, she raised her son-in-law, Servius Tullius, to the throne. She was a woman of such liberality that the Romans preserved her girdle as a relic, with great veneration.

TANCAVILLE, Jean de Melun, Count de tan'-kar-vel, a celebrated French warrior, who took part in the conquest of Prussia by the Teutonic Knights, and also fought against the Moors in Spain, against the English in Normandy, and elsewhere. John, king of France, nominated him grand chamberlain of the kingdom. Taken prisoner at the battle of Poitiers, he returned in 1358, and played a prominent part in the signature of the peace of Bretigny in 1360. He subsequently won the favour of Charles V.

who appointed him governor of Champagne, Burgundy, and Languedoc. d. 1362.

TANCRED, tân'-cred, a Sicilian prince, of Norman extraction, who accompanied Bohemond, Prince of Tarentum, to the Holy Land. His exploits, true or fabulous, have been immortalized by Tasso in the "Jerusalem Delivered." His life, written by an old chronicler, is included in the "Historical Memoirs" of Guizot. d. 1112.

TANCRED OF HAUTEVILLE, a Norman baron, who fought under Richard the Good, duke of Normandy. His twelve sons were famous for their strength, beauty of person, and valour. Serlon, the eldest, accompanied William of Normandy to the conquest of England; William, another son, who was surnamed "Strong of arm," became count of Apulia; a third member of the same family, Robert Guiscard, or the "wise," won the dukedom of Calabria, and, after his brother's death, that of Apulia. This latter was the founder of the Norman dynasty of Sicily.

TANCRED, king of Sicily, ascended the throne in 1189, after the death of William II. He was soon afterwards attacked by the emperor Henry VI. of Germany, who, having married Constance, the aunt of William II., set up, in consequence, a claim to the throne of Sicily. Tancered defeated the German army, and retained his crown until his death, which occurred in the year 1194. The emperor subsequently became master of Sicily, and took prisoners, William, the infant son of Tancered, and his mother, Queen Sibylla, who had been appointed regent. The child was mutilated and deprived of sight, and Sibylla imprisoned in a convent. Thus ended the Norman dynasty in Sicily, which had reigned there for upwards of a hundred years.

TANDY, James Napper, tân'-de, a native of Ireland, who rendered himself obnoxious to the government by his seditious practices, and, in consequence, was compelled to flee to France. The executive directory gave him a commission, as general of brigade in the expedition against Ireland, in August, 1798, under General Rey. He was afterwards taken at Hamburg, and being brought to Ireland, was tried and convicted as a traitor, but permitted to retire to France. d. at Bordeaux, 1803.

TANNAHILL, Robert, tân'-a-hil, a Scottish poet, was born at Paisley, Renfrewshire, and bred to the trade of a hand-loom weaver. He studied the works of Burns with enthusiasm, became fired with a desire to emulate him, and though he fell greatly short of his model, produced some very delightful songs, and other lyric pieces. b. 1774; drowned, 1810.

TANNER, Thomas, tân'-ner, a learned English scholar, who received his education at Queen's College, Oxford. In 1696 he was elected fellow of All Souls, and consecrated bishop of St. Asaph in 1732. He wrote "Notitia Monastica; or, an Account of all the Religious Houses in England and Wales;" and "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica." He also produced a new and improved edition of Wood's "Athenæ Oxonienses;" and bequeathed a valuable collection of ancient charters, deeds, &c., to the Bodleian library at Oxford. b. in Wiltshire, 1674; d. 1735.

TANSILLO, Luigi, tân'-seel-lo, an Italian poet, who spent a great part of his life in the family of the Marquis de Villafranca, viceroy of Naples, and is said to have been appointed judge of Gaeta. He wrote in his youth a poem entitled "Il Vendemmiatore" (or the Vintager); and on account of its indecency, all his works were laid under an interdict; but having afterwards presented another to the pope, on the "Tears of St. Peter," his holiness took off the prohibition from all his poems except the culpable one. B. at Nola, Naples, about 1510; D. 1568.

TARIK, or TARIF, Ben Zeyyad, tu'-reek, an Arab general, who, at the orders of Musa, governor of Africa, invaded Spain in 710, landing at the foot of the rock called after him Gebel Tarik, which subsequently became corrupted into Gibraltar. In the following year he defeated Roderick, the last of the Visigothic kings of Spain, in an engagement wherein the king and the flower of his Gothic chivalry fell. Musa, becoming jealous of Tarik, cast him into prison; but he was released at the command of the caliph of Damascus. D. in obscurity, about 720.

TARTTON, Richard, tarl'-ton, a celebrated English actor and jester. He performed at the "Bull," in Bishopsgate Street, the Judge's character in a play called "The Famous Victories of Henry V.," which was prior to that of Shakespeare. Stow says he was constituted one of the queen's players in 1553. He was the author of a drama called "The Seven Deadly Sins," of which Gabriel Hervey speaks as a "most deadly, but most lively play." This play has been lost. Dr. Cave, in his work entitled "De Politia," says, "We have our Tart-ton, in whose voice and countenance exists every kind of humorous expressions, and whose eccentric brain is filled with quaint and witty conceptions." B. in Shropshire, date unknown; D. in London, 1588.

TARPA, Spurius Metius, tar'-pa, a Roman critic in the time of Augustus, who was appointed, with four others, to examine in the Temple of Apollo the merit of poetical pieces and plays. Cicero and Horace mention him with honour.

TARPEIA, tar-pe'-ya, the daughter of Tarpeius, governor of the Capitol under Romulus. She betrayed that place to Tatius, the general of the Sabines, on condition of receiving what himself and his soldiers wore on their left arms, meaning their bracelets of gold. When Tatius entered the place, he threw his bracelet and shield on Tarpeia, in which he was imitated by all his followers; so that she perished under the weight. She was buried on the mount which was afterwards called by her name, and from which persons convicted of treason were precipitated.

TARQUIN THE ELDER, tar'-quin (TARQUINIUS tar-quin'-i-us), according to early Roman history, the fifth king of Rome, was the son of Greek parents, and born in the town of Tarquinii, in Etruria. His original name was Lucumo, which he changed to Tarquinius on going to Rome, by the advice of his wife Tanaquil. (See TANAQUIL.) He so endeared himself to the Romans by the liberality of his manners, that Ancus Marcius nominated him guardian of his children. The people, on the death of that monarch, placed, in 616 B.C., the crown on the head of Tarquin, who reigned with great moderation and popularity. He defeated the Latins and Sabines, and conquered Etruria. He increased the number of the senate, repaired the Capitol, which he ornamented with several elegant buildings, and formed aqueducts and subterranean sewers. He also introduced several reforms into the constitution of the state. He was killed by assassins, set on by the sons of his predecessor, 578 B.C.

TARQUIN, surnamed Superbus, "The Proud," or "the Tyrant," was the son of the preceding, and seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia, daughter of Servius Tullius, and at her instigation murdered his father-in-law, and seized the kingdom. His reign was tyrannical and extravagant, so that his subjects were about to revolt, when, to divert their attention, he engaged in a foreign war; but while he was at the siege of Ardea, the infamous conduct of his son Sextus proved the ruin of his family. (See LUCRETIA and BRUTUS.) The Romans rose and shut the gates against Tarquin, who retired to Etruria. Tarquin subsequently found protection under the mighty Lars Porsenna, of Clusium. Several attempts were made by Tarquin to regain his kingdom; but, after the battle of the Lake Regillus, in 496 B.C., when Aruns, his only surviving son, was slain, the old king abandoned the contest in despair, and, retiring to Cumæ, died there in 485 B.C. Niebuhr declares that the greater portion of the history of the Tarquins is fabulous. Macaulay, in his "Lays of Ancient Rome," makes use of the story of the Tarquins as the subject of two ballads—"Horatius," and "The Battle of the Lake Regillus." The historian is of opinion that the history of the Tarquins, as we have it, has "been compiled from the works of several popular poets; and one at least of these poets appears to have visited the Greek colonies in Italy, if not Greece itself. . . . Many of the most striking adventures of the house of Tarquin, before Lucretia makes her appearance, have a Greek character." Tarquin built the Capitol, purchased the famous Sibylline books, which he deposited in the threefold temple of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, erected by him.

TARQUIN, Sextus, son of Tarquin the Proud, pretending to be a deserter from his father's army, took refuge at the Latin town of Gabii, whose citizens became so charmed with him, that he was raised to the highest offices, and placed in command of the Gabian army. After putting to death or banishing the most distinguished men in the city, he treacherously surrendered it to his father. He violated the chaste Lucretia; whereupon Brutus roused the Roman people, and the family of the Tarquins were banished for ever. His father retired to Etruria, with his son Aruns; but Sextus returned to Gabii, where, his former faithlessness being remembered, he was put to death.

TARTAGLIA, Niccolo, tar-tal'-ya, a celebrated Italian mathematician, who was the son of a porter, and was left an orphan in his sixth year. His surname is unknown; that by which he is called, signifying "stammerer," being a derisive epithet bestowed upon him in his youth, because of an impediment in his speech, which arose from his having been wounded in the mouth by a French soldier at the taking of Brescia in 1512. After being employed as a tutor at Verona and Vicenza, he became professor of mathematics at Brescia, which place he quitted for Venice, where he held a like appointment. He composed a number of learned works upon natural philosophy, algebra, and military engineering. The algebraic formula which is called Cardan's rule, was, in reality, discovered by Tartaglia, who, after many importunities, consented to impart a knowledge of it to Cardan. The latter, in his "Ars

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Tartini

Magna," published the rule, although he had made a solemn pledge to Tartaglia that he would keep it secret. Thereupon, Tartaglia challenged Cardan to a public disputation upon mathematical subjects. The disciple of Cardan, Luigi Ferrari, accepted the challenge. A public contest between the two was held at Milan; but when Tartaglia was triumphing over his rival, the spectators, anxious to preserve their townsman Ferrari from defeat, raised a tumult, which brought the sitting to a termination. He is said to have made the first Italian translation of Euclid; he likewise dedicated a treatise on mechanics, hydrostatics, and the art of fortifying places, to Henry VIII. b. at Brescia, about the commencement of the 16th century; d. at Venice, 1557.

TARTINI, Joseph, tar-te'-ne, a celebrated Italian musician, who became so excellent a performer on the violin, that he was appointed master of the band in the church of St. Anthony, at Padua. His works are Sonatas, and a "Treatise on Music" which was translated into English by Stillingfleet. b. at Pisano, 1682; d. at Padua, 1770.

TARVER, John Charles, tur-ver, a learned philologist, was born in France, of English parents, who were thrown into prison at the outbreak of war between England and France in 1793. His parents contrived to effect their escape; but he was left behind until a favourable opportunity should occur to send him to his family. The French gentleman in whose charge he had been placed, educated him as his own son, and, in 1803, obtained for him an appointment in the "Administration de la Marine." He subsequently became secretary to the admiral of the fleet at Toulon, Brest, and other ports. On the conclusion of the war, he paid a visit to his family, and shortly afterwards, being resolved to settle in England, he resigned his post under the French government. He obtained the situation of French master in the grammar-school at Macclesfield. In 1826 he was nominated to a like post in Eton school, and retained it until his death. He produced a work of great importance, entitled "The Phrasological French Dictionary," and likewise published "Dictionary of French Verbs," "Lectures on French History," and revised editions of the French grammars of Levisae and Wanostrucht. b. at Dieppe, Normandy, 1790; d. 1851.

TASKER, William, tas'-ker, an English divine and poet, whose principal works are "Odes of Pindar and Horace, translated into English Verse," "Ode to the Warlike Genius of Britain," and "Letters on Physiognomy." d. 1800.

TASMAN, Abel Jansen, tas'-man, a celebrated Dutch navigator, who, having distinguished himself in the service of the Dutch East India Company, was commissioned by Anthony Van Diemen to explore the coast of the Australian continent. Tasman sailed from Batavia in 1642. He first discovered a land which he named Van Diemen, and afterwards the country now called New Zealand. In 1644 he set sail upon a second voyage, the results of which were carefully concealed by the Dutch government. But, says Flinders, "it seems to be the general opinion that Tasman sailed round the Gulf of Carpentaria, and then westward along Arnheim, and the northern coast of Van Diemen's Land. . . . This opinion is strengthened by finding the names of Tasman, and of the governor-general (Van Diemen), and of two of the council who signed his instructions, applied to places at the head of the gulf; as is also that of Maria, the daughter of the governor, to whom Tasman is said to have been attached." Nothing is known of the life of Tasman, neither his birthplace nor where he died. Lived in the 17th century.

TASSIE, James, tas'-se, an eminent Scotch numismatist, who was bred to the business of a stonemason, but, happening to visit an exhibition of paintings at Glasgow, he resolved to become an artist. Still continuing to work at his trade, he studied drawing in his leisure hours. In 1768 he repaired to Dublin, where he found employment as a sculptor and modeller. In the same city he was introduced to Doctor Quin, who was engaged in making experiments in the art of imitating gems by means of coloured glass. Tassie soon afterwards became assistant to this gentleman, and made so much progress in his new employment that he was advised by Dr. Quin to make it his business, and to establish himself in London. He acted upon this suggestion, and, after struggling with difficulties for a time, gradually attained a high reputation. By the year 1775 he had collected a large number of ancient and modern gems, of which he sold sulphur impressions, or pastes. In 1788 he was commissioned to execute a set of casts of his gems for the empress of Russia, as, at a later period, his nephew and successor supplied the emperor Alexander with a set of casts taken from the valuable coins which had formerly belonged to Dr. William Hunter, and of which he had become the proprietor. His pastes were very much used by the jewellers, who set them in rings, bracelets, &c. In 1791 Tassie published a curious but important work, in the shape of a catalogue of his collection, which at this time contained upwards of 15,000 articles. To this catalogue, which was comprised in two thick quarto volumes, was appended a treatise by Mr. E. Raspe, upon the art of imitating gems by means of pastes, as well as some valuable information respecting the history of engraving upon stones. Tassie obtained from the Society of Arts a prize for his successful imitations of ancient onyx. After his death, his business was continued by his nephew in Leicester-square. b. near Glasgow, 1735; d. in London, 1799.

TASSILON, Duke of Bavaria, tas'-si-lon, who declared war against Charlemagne, by whom he was defeated and taken prisoner in 788. He was condemned to death by the General Assembly of the Franks, but the sentence was commuted into imprisonment for life.

TASSO, Bernardo, tas'-so, an Italian, and the father of the more illustrious Torquato Tasso. His poetical talents recommended him to the notice of the Prince of Salerno, who appointed him his secretary. He accompanied his patron to the court of Charles V. in Germany, to lay the grievances of the Neapolitan people before the emperor. But the prince finding Charles incensed against them, and fearing for his own safety, fled to France, whither he was accompanied by Bernardo Tasso. He subsequently returned to Italy, and was appointed governor of Ostiglia by the duke of Mantua. He wrote a poem upon the old Spanish romance of "Amadis de Gaula;" another, entitled "Floridante." His letters, in three volumes, have been published. b. at Bergamo, 1493; d. 1569.

TASSO, Torquato, a celebrated Italian poet, was the son of the preceding, whom he accompanied to France, and, though then but nine years old, wrote verses on their misfortune, in which he compared himself to young Aeneas escaping with Æneas. Young Tasso was sent to Padua to study the law, and while there wrote his poem of "Rinaldo," at the age of eighteen. In 1586 he was taken into the service of Cardinal d'Este, brother of the duke of Ferrara, with whose sister, the Princess Eleonora, he fell in love. This fatal passion proved the source of that melancholy humour of which he was the prey during twenty years. The duke of Ferrara, however, was unaware of this poetical passion, and made Tasso his especial favourite. Quitting Ferrara, he went to his sister, at Sorrento; but his love for the princess becoming stronger by absence, he returned to the court of Ferrara, where, in the presence of the duke, he had the imprudence to throw a knife at one of the domestics of his patron, who ordered Tasso to be taken to a convent, and there confined, as a man deprived of his reason. Effecting his escape from this place shortly afterwards, he repaired to Naples, where for some time he enjoyed repose. After wandering over Italy in an erratic manner, Tasso, in 1579, returned to Ferrara, when, being refused admittance to the duke's presence, he uttered some contemptuous words as to the family of Este; whereupon he was arrested, and during seven years was confined in the hospital of Santa Anna as a lunatic. At length he obtained his liberty, through the intercession of Vincenzo Gonzaga, son of the duke of Mantua. In 1592 Pope Clement VIII., who was a great admirer of his talents, called him to Rome, where he was received with honourable marks of distinction; and great preparations were made for solemnly crowning him in the Capitol as the prince of poets, when he fell sick, and died on the evening before the intended ceremony. The work which has immortalized his name is the epic poem of "Jerusalem Delivered," which has been translated into English by Hoole, Fairfax, Hunt, and others. The best Italian edition is that of Professor Rosini, Padua, 1820. b. at Sorrento, Naples, 1544; d. at Rome, 1595.

TASSONI, Alexander, tas-so'-ne, an Italian poet. His "Secchia Rapita," or "Rape of the Bucket," a mock-heroic poem, was written on the occasion of the war between Modena and Bologna. Besides this, he wrote "Observations on Petrarch," and an abridgment of the "Ecclesiastical Annals" of Baronius. b. at Modena, 1665; d. at the same city, 1635.

TATE, Nahum, tat, an Irish poet, who was appointed laureate in 1692. Tate wrote "Panacea," a poem on tea; ten dramatic pieces, a number of poems on various subjects, and, in conjunction with Brady, translated the Psalms into metre. b. at Dublin, 1652; d. in London, 1715.

TATIANUS, of Syria, tai'-shi-ai'-nus, a Platonic philosopher, who became a convert to Christianity, and a disciple of Justin Martyr. He still, however, retained the Platonic ideas, and fell into dangerous errors, particularly that of Marcian, respecting the two supreme principles of good and evil. He rejected some of St. Paul's epistles, and formed a sect called the Encratites. He was the author of a Harmony of the four Gospels, but nothing remains of his except an Apology for the Christian Religion, printed at Oxford in 1700. Flourished in the 2nd century.

TATIUS, tai'-shi-us, king of the Sabines, who, to revenge the rape of the Sabine women, made war upon the Romans, and, by treachery, obtained possession of the Capitol. (See TARPEIA.) The mediation of the Sabine women effected a reconciliation, and Tatius brought his subjects to reside at Rome, where he shared the government with Romulus, who is, however, supposed to have caused him to be murdered at Lavinium, 742 b.c.

TATIUS, Achilles, a native of Alexandria, who embraced the Christian religion, and wrote a "Commentary on the Phenomena of Aratus," which is extant; also a Greek romance, called "The Amours of Leucippus and Clitophon."

TAUBMANN, Frederick, toub'-man, a learned German writer and poet, who became professor of poetry and eloquence at the university of Wittenberg. He was also appointed court-poet. He greatly contributed to revive the study of the Latin language, by producing a dissertation upon that subject, which was published a year after his death. He also edited the works of Plautus and Virgil, and enjoyed the reputation of being one of the wittiest men of his age. His poems, which were composed in Latin, are included in the Melodæia, Columbæ Poetice, and other collections. b. near Baireuth, 1585; d. at Wittenberg, 1613.

TAUNTON, Henry Labouchere, Lord, taun'-ton, a Liberal statesman, who was educated at Winchester and Christchurch, Oxford. After holding office as one of the lords of the Admiralty, he became, in 1839, president of the board of Trade under Lord Melbourne until 1841. In 1846 he again took office as chief secretary for Ireland, becoming president of the board of Trade a second time in 1855, and colonial secretary in 1858. In the following year he was raised to the upper House. b. 1798; d. 1869.

TAUSAN, TAUSSEN, or TAGESSEN, John, taus'-sen, a Danish divine, who, meeting accidentally with some of the writings of Luther, was so impressed by them as to proceed to Wittenberg to study under the Reformer. Returning to Denmark in 1521, he preached sermons upon the new doctrines, and with so much effect, that Protestantism began to take root throughout the kingdom. In 1541 he was appointed Protestant bishop of Ripen. He was the author of a large number of controversial works. b. at Birkinde, in the island of Funen, 1494; d. 1581.

TAVANNES, ta-van', the name of an ancient family of Burgundy, which has furnished several distinguished personages to French history, the most celebrated being—

TAVANNES, Gaspard de Saulx, Lord of, an eminent French general, who, while a page to Francis I., was, with that monarch, taken prisoner at Pavia. He subsequently distinguished himself by his bravery at La Rochelle, in 1543, and at the battle of Cerisoles in the following year. Appointed to the command of the army, he took Metz in 1552, and, two years later, went to the succor of the Pope in Italy. He had a principal share in the education of the young duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. of France, and in 1589, participated in the victories of Jarnac and Moncontour over the Protestants. For these services he was made a marshal of France. Always vehemently opposed to the doctrines of the Reformers, he has been charged with being one of the chief promoters of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. B. at Dijon, 1509; D. 1573.

TAVANNES, Guillaume de Saulx, Lord of, the eldest son of the preceding, became a zealous partisan of Henry IV., and distinguished himself in several battles. He wrote a work entitled "Historical Memoirs, from the year 1580 until 1596." B. 1553; D. 1635.

TAVANNES, Jean de Saulx, Viscount de, was another son of the marshal, and brother of the preceding. He accompanied Henry III. to the siege of Rochelle, and to Poland. Returning to France, he became a prominent member of the Catholic league, was created a marshal of France, and pursued a military career until 1595, at which period he retired to his estates. He wrote a life of his father, which is sometimes entitled "Memoirs," but is totally independent of the memoirs of his brother Guillaume. B. 1555; D. about 1630.

TAVERNIER, Jean Baptiste, Baron d'Aubonne, to-vair'-ne-ai, a celebrated French traveller, who went through Turkey, Persia, and the East Indies six times. He acquired a large fortune by trading in jewels, with which he purchased the barony of Aubonne, and was ennobled by Louis XIV. His account of his travels is greatly esteemed, and has been translated into English. B. at Paris, 1605; D. at Moscow, 1689.

TAYLER, Frederick, tai'-ler, a modern English artist, who was considered as among the best water-colour painters. His transcripts of highland scenery, peasants, deer, and dogs, hawking and hunting parties of the 16th century, as well as a large number of illustrations for books, were characterized by great vigour and originality. "The Highland Landscapes, exhibiting the Wakefield's Family going to Church," were his most ambitious pictures. B. near Elstree, Hertfordshire, 1804.

TAYLOR, Rowland, tai'-lor, an English divine and martyr, who is claimed as ancestor of Bishop Jeremy Taylor, by Heber. Archbishop Cranmer, whose chaplain Taylor was, appointed him to a living in Suffolk. Under the reign of Mary he was summoned to London, to answer the charges brought against him of having married, and refusing to celebrate mass in his church. He was condemned to be burnt at the stake; which sentence was carried out on Aldham common, near Hadleigh, Suffolk, in 1555.

TAYLOR, John, commonly called "the water-poet." After going to school at Gloucester, where, he says, he could get no further than his accident, which "gravelled" him, he repaired to London, and was bound apprentice to a waterman. Notwithstanding the laboriousness of this employment, he wrote a number of poetical pieces, from which he took the appellation of the king's water-poet. An enthusiastic royalist, he, upon the outbreak of the Revolution, went to Oxford, where he kept a tavern which was much resorted to by the students. Taylor aided the royal cause by his satires and songs. When Oxford surrendered, he returned to London, and opened a public-house, setting up the sign of the "Mourning Crown." This, however, he was obliged to remove; on which he hung up his own portrait, with the following verse:—

"There's many a king's head hang'd up for a sign,
And many a saint's head too: then why not mine?"

He composed upwards of eighty pieces in prose and verse, which exhibit the workings of a vigorous but uneducated mind. These effusions contain many curious pictures of the time in which their author lived. B. at Gloucester, 1580; D. in London, 1654.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, a learned English prelate, who was the son of a barber at Cambridge, where he received his education at Caius College, after which he entered into orders, and became so eminent a preacher, that Archbishop Laud procured him a fellowship of All Souls College, Oxford. He was also appointed chaplain to that prelate and rector of Uppingham, in Rutlandshire. In 1642 he received the degree of doctor of divinity from Charles I., whose chaplain he was, and to whose cause he adhered. After the defeat of the royalists, he retired to Carmarthenshire, where he taught a school for a livelihood. He afterwards went with Lord Conway to Ireland, where he wrote his "Cases of Conscience." Charles II., at his restoration, preferred Taylor to the bishopric of Down and Connor. In the same year he became privy councillor and vice-chancellor of Trinity College, Dublin. Bishop Heber thinks that Jeremy Taylor was removed to a distance from court principally because he had been married to a natural daughter of Charles I., which circumstance might have given the exemplary bishop a plausible pretence for speaking plainly to the king upon many parts of his conduct. Bishop Taylor wrote, among other eloquent works, "The Great Exemplar, or the Life and Death of Jesus Christ;" "Holy Living and Dying;" and several sermons and controversial and pious treatises. "Whether," says Bishop Heber, in his life of the learned divine, "whether he describes the duties, or dangers, or hopes of man, or the mercy, power, and justice of the Most High; whether he exhorts or instructs his brethren, or offers up his supplications in their behalf to the common Father of all, his conceptions and his expressions belong to the loftiest and most sacred description of poetry, of which they only want what they cannot be said to need,—the name and the metrical arrangement." The works of Jeremy Taylor were edited and published by Bishop Heber in 1822. B. at Cambridge, 1613; D. at Lisburn, Ireland, 1667.

TAYLOR, Brook, a celebrated English mathematician and the discoverer of the theorem which bears his name. In 1701 he entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1708 wrote his "Treatise on the Centre of Oscillation." In 1709 he took the degree of bachelor of laws; was chosen secretary to the Royal Society in 1714, and in the same year took his degree of doctor of laws. He published several elaborate works on mathematical subjects, the most important of which were, "Treatise on Linear Perspective," and "Methodus Incrementorum Directa et Inversa." B. at Edmon-ton, 1685; D. 1731.

TAYLOR, John, a learned Unitarian minister, who produced a Hebrew and English Concordance, a work on Original Sin, and other theological treatises. B. 1694; D. 1761.

TAYLOR, John, a learned English critic, who was born in humble circumstances, but became, in 1730, fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. He took his doctor's degree in the civil law, became librarian and registrar of the university, and an advocate in Doctors' Commons; but afterwards entering into orders, was preferred to a canon residentiaryship of St. Paul's, and the archdeaconry of Buckingham. He published excellent editions of Lysias and Demosthenes, and wrote a work entitled "Elements of the Civil Law." b. at Shrewsbury, 1703; d. 1766.

TAYLOR, Sir Robert, an English sculptor and architect, who was at first placed under Sir Henry Cheere, a sculptor, and subsequently studied for a short period at Rome, whence he was suddenly recalled by the death of his father. Thus thrown upon his own resources, he set up in business as a statuary, and meeting with some success as a sculptor of monuments for architectural purposes, he resolved to devote himself entirely to architecture. He soon found a great deal of employment, and, in 1756, was engaged, with Dance, to make alterations on old London-bridge. He added some wings to the Bank of England, erected the Stone Buildings, and the Six Clerks' Office, in the vicinity of Lincoln's Inn. His villa for Sir Charles Asgill, and the seat of Lord Grimston at Gorhambury, are among the best of his designs executed for private persons. He was very fortunate in his profession, and obtained the appointments of surveyor to the Admiralty, Bank of England, Greenwich Hospital, and the Foundling Hospital. While holding the office of sheriff of London, in 1783, he was created a knight. He bequeathed a sum of money to the university of Oxford, wherewith to found an institute for the study of modern languages. With these funds were erected the Taylor Buildings, at Oxford. At the time of his death he had realized a fortune of £180,000, though he was known to say that he began life with hardly eightpence. b. in London, 1714; d. in the same city, 1788.

TAYLOR, Henry, an English divine, who wrote several learned works, as—"An Essay on the Beauty of the Divine Economy;" "Ben Mordecai's Apology for embracing Christianity;" "Thoughts on the Nature of the Grand Apostasy of the Christian Churches." d. 1785.

TAYLOR, Isaac, an English writer, was originally a line-engraver, but subsequently became minister of an Independent congregation at Colechester, in Essex. He gave his children, several of whom were distinguished in literature, a careful training under his own superintendence. He was the author of—"Beginnings of Biography," "Scenes for Tarry-at-home Travellers," "Advice to the Teens," and other works intended for juvenile perusal. d. 1829.

TAYLOR, Isaac, a modern English writer, chiefly upon theological subjects, was the son of the preceding, under whose superintendence he received a careful private education. At an early age he made a translation of Herodotus, and afterwards devoted himself to the composition of works which display deeply reflective habits and profound religious feeling as the characteristics of their author. His principal works were—"History of the Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times;" the "Physical Theory of Another Life;" "Spiritual Christianity;" the "Natural History of Enthusiasm;" the "Natural History of Fanaticism;" "Loyola and Jesuitism;" "Wesley and Methodism;" and the "Restoration of Belief." He likewise contributed many articles to the reviews. b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, 1787; d. 1865.

TAYLOR, Ann and Jane, English authoresses, and sisters of the preceding, composed a number of works for juvenile reading of great merit. The chief of these productions were, "Essays in Rhyme"; "Contributions of Q.Q.," "Display, a Tale," "Hymns for Infant Minds," and "Original Poems." Jane, who never married, was b. in 1733; d. 1824. Ann, the elder of the sisters, b. 1782, married the Rev. Joseph Gilbert in 1813, and d. 1866. Ann Taylor, mother of Ann and Jane, was the author of "Maternal Solitude," and other works. d. 1830.

TAYLOR, Thomas, a learned English writer, whose services to literature were immense; for he translated many of the great works of antiquity, which the professed scholars of England neglected, and, indeed, refused to reproduce in an English form. Though a poor man, his accomplishments were so highly appreciated by the duke of Norfolk, Mr. Meredith (a retired tradesman), and other liberal individuals, that he was enabled to print works which cost £10,000. Out of a long list of translations, may be quoted "The Hymns of Orpheus," "Plotinus on the Beautiful," the works of Plato, "Two Orations of the Emperor Julian," Pausanias's "Description of Greece," the works of Aristotle, Hederic's Greek Lexicon, Jamblicus's "Life of Pythagoras," and the "Metamorphoses" and philosophical works of Apuleius. b. in London, 1753; d. in the same city, 1835.

TAYLOR, William, an English writer, who was designed for a commercial career, but during the process of his education, under the celebrated Mrs. Barbauld and upon the continent, he evinced so great a capacity for the acquisition of languages, as well as for mastering the intricacies of composition, that, upon his return from Germany, he was permitted by his parents to indulge his natural inclinations. When about 20, he commenced making translations from the German, in which department he afterwards acquired considerable distinction. His first publication of importance was a English reproduction of Bürger's "Lenore." In 1830 he produced a work, in three volumes, entitled "A Survey of German Poetry," a fine selection of lyrics from the German poets.

The subsequent years of his life he continued to give translations from the German, most of which were inserted in the magazines and reviews of the day. To Taylor is unquestionably due the honour of first making the English reader acquainted with the literary treasures of Germany. b. at Norwich, 1765; d. 1836.

TAYLOR, Sir Herbert, entered the army in 1783, and served in the campaigns of that and the following year. He was present at the sieges of Valenciennes and Dunkirk, and at numerous other affairs of minor importance; and in 1795 returned to England, having the appointment of aide-de-camp to the commander-in-chief. He subsequently was appointed private secretary to the duke of York, in which capacity he continued until appointed to the same office to George III. He was executor to the will of the duke of York, trustee to the private property of George III., and was warmly patronized by queen Charlotte, who made him master of St. Katharine's Hospital, Regent's Park. In addition to his military services, Sir Herbert on several occasions was intrusted with political missions. b. 1775; d. 1839.

TAYLOR, William Cooke, LL.D., an eminent writer on miscellaneous subjects, after studying at the university of Dublin, repaired to the metropolis, and entered upon a literary career. He was employed in 1846, by the British government, to inquire into the system of education on the Continent. Among his chief works are, "Manuals of Ancient and Modern History;" "Life and Times of Sir Robert Peel;" "History of Mohammedanism;" "Revolutions and Remarkable Conspiracies of Europe;" and "The History of the House of Orleans." b. at Youghal, 1800; d. 1849.

TAYLOR, General Zachary, President of the United States of North America, served in the war of 1812, and, for his defence of Fort Harrison, on the Wabash river, was raised to the rank of major; in 1819 he became lieutenant-colonel, having previously distinguished himself as commander at Green Bay, on Lake Michigan. In the Black Hawk war, and in the Seminole war, he evinced as much tact as bravery in the execution of several harassing employments. In 1840 he was appointed to the chief command of the south-western division of the United States army. After the annexation of Texas, he was ordered to protect the new state from a threatened invasion from Mexico; but after remaining upon the defensive for several months, he proceeded westward, and having encountered the Mexican army under Santa Anna, numbering 20,000 men, he inflicted a signal defeat upon it at Buenvista, although his own force was not greater than 6000. This decisive engagement led to the peace of 1849, after which he retired to his estate in Louisiana. In the same year, however, he was put in nomination and elected to the presidency of the United States. b. in Virginia, 1784; d. at Washington, 1850.

TAYLOR, Isidore Justin Severin, Baron, a modern French antiquary and traveller, who was descended from an Irish family naturalized in France. His early education was designed to qualify him for a military career, but his own tastes were towards science and art. Instead of entering the Polytechnic School, he became the pupil of the painter Savé; but, in a short time, commenced writing art-criticisms for the Paris journals. About 1810 he set out upon a tour in Belgium, Germany, and Italy. Returning to France during the last disastrous days of the empire, he was enrolled a sub-lieutenant of the Garde Mobile. Under the Restoration he served in the Royal Guard, and took part in the Spanish campaign; but, on attaining the grade of chef d'escadron, he retired from the army, having formed a resolution to devote himself to literature and the arts. In 1824 he was appointed royal commissioner of the Théâtre Français. Whilst holding this office, he introduced several improvements in the scenery and appointments of that stage, and it was to him that Victor Hugo owed the first representation of his "Hernani." The government of Charles X. sent him to Egypt to obtain the obelisk of Luxor and other rare objects of antiquity. After the Revolution of 1830, Louis Philippe appointed him inspector of the fine arts; in which capacity he visited Italy, Sicily, Spain, Greece, Turkey, Asia Minor, Egypt, and Africa, bringing home from these countries a valuable collection of archaeological treasures, which have found a place in the Louvre and other French museums. His most important productions were, "Voyages Pittoresques et Romantiques dans l'Ancienne France," in 20 vols., and a series of artistic works upon Spain, Portugal, the coast of Africa, Egypt, Switzerland, and Italy. He was a member of the Academy of Fine Arts, and a commander of the Legion of Honour. b. at Brussels, 1789.

TAYLOR, Henry, a modern English poet, who was engaged in the department of the Colonial Office, where he rose to a senior clerkship. His leisure was devoted to literature, and he produced several dramatic works in prose and verse, and a number of essays, which exhibited qualities of a very high order. The principal of these were, "Isaac Commens," a play in verse, and in five acts; "Philip van Artevelde," a dramatic romance; "The Statesman," a work in prose; "Edwin the Fair," an historical drama; the "Eve of the Conquest," and other poems; the "Virgin Widow," and "Notes from Life," and "Notes from Books." b. early in the 19th century.

TAYLOR, Alfred Swaine, a modern English physician and chemical analyst, who at first studied his profession at the united hospitals of Guy and St. Thomas, but afterwards attended the lectures of Gay-Lussac, Orfila, and Dupuytren, at Paris. He was appointed lecturer on medical jurisprudence at Guy's Hospital in 1831, and in the following year became joint lecturer on chemistry at the same institution. He had previously passed his examination at the Society of Apothecaries, and had received his diploma as member of the Royal College of Surgeons. In 1843 he became a licentiate, and at a subsequent period a fellow, of the Royal College of Physicians. Devoting himself to that department of his profession called Medical Jurisprudence, he produced some valuable works thereon. He was also much employed in making post-mortem examinations and chemical analyses in cases of supposed poisoning. The evidence given by him at the trials of William Palmer and Smethurst was strongly opposed by other scientific men; but his talents as a chemical analyst have been generally admitted. b. at Northfleet, Kent, 1806.

TAYLOR, Tom, a modern English dramatist and general writer, who received his earliest education at the Grange School of Sunderland, and, after spending two sessions at the university of Glasgow, in 1837 proceeded to Cambridge, where he was elected fellow of Trinity College. At a subsequent period he was appointed to the professorship of English language and literature at University College, London. He was called to the bar as a member of the Inner Temple in 1845. In literature he distinguished himself as a humorous and keenly observant contributor to the pages of "Punch," and as the author of a number of plays, many of which are certainly the wittiest, most elegant, and best-constructed works of the kind now to be found upon the English stage. The most popular of these dramatic pieces are "Still Waters Run Deep," "The Victims," "The Unequal Match," "The Contested Election," and "The Overland Route." His artistic biographies of Haydon and Leslie are excellent. In 1850 he became assistant-secretary, and in 1854 secretary, of the Board of Health. b. at Sunderland, 1817.

TAYLOR, Bayard, an American author and traveller, who, in 1844, left his native country upon a course of travel in England, Switzerland, France, Germany, and Italy, an account of which he published after his return to the United States, in a work entitled "Views Afoot, or Europe seen with the Knapsack and Staff." Attracting a large amount of attention, this work gave the young writer a position in the literary circles of his country. In 1846 he became one of the editors of the "New York Tribune," in which journal he inserted a series of sketches of life in California. In 1851 he returned to Europe, and after travelling along the shores of the Mediterranean, went eastward, and visited India, China, and Japan. He also sojourned in Syria, Asia Minor, Sicily, and Egypt, an account of these wanderings being conveyed, in a most lively and graphic manner, in his "Life and Landscapes in Egypt," "Pictures of Palestine," &c. b. in Pennsylvania, 1825.

TEBALDO, or TIBALDO, Antonio, te-bal'-de-o, an eminent Italian poet, who composed in both Latin and Italian. He was a favourite with Leo X., after whose death, however, he fell into distress. His works consist of pastorals and epigrams. b. at Ferrara, about 1463 d. at Rome, 1537.

TEGNER, Esaias, teg'-ner, the greatest poet of Sweden, after pursuing a brilliant career at the university of Lund, became professor of Greek in that seat of learning, and took holy orders in 1813, and was made bishop of Wexö in 1824. His works were collected in 6 vols., and published at Stockholm in 1847-8. His poems of "Frithiof," "Axel," and "The Children of the Lord's Supper," have been translated into English by Professor Longfellow. b. in Sweden, 1782; d. 1848.

TEIGNMOUTH, John Shore, Lord, tain'-mouth, an English statesman and author, who commenced public life in 1769, as a cadet in the service of the East India Company. In a few years his acquirements in Persian and other Eastern languages obtained for him rapid promotion. He became the intimate friend of Warren Hastings, and accompanied the governor-general to England in 1785. In the following year he returned to the East, on becoming a member of the Supreme Council under Lord Cornwallis, the new governor-general. In 1793 he was created a baronet for his services in aid of the judicial measures introduced by Lord Cornwallis, whose successor he became in the same year. He retained this high post until 1797, when he resigned, and was created Baron Teignmouth. He succeeded Sir William Jones as president of the Asiatic Society, and, subsequently to his return to England, produced the memoirs and correspondence of that oriental scholar. In 1807 he was nominated a commissioner for the affairs of India, and about the same time a member of the privy council. He was the author of a Letter to the Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, on the subject of the Bible Society; and "Considerations on Communicating to the Inhabitants of India the Knowledge of Christianity." b. in Devonshire, 1751; d. 1834.

TELLO, ti'-lo, a British saint, who founded a college at Llandaff, which was afterwards erected into a bishopric. There were several churches dedicated to him in Wales. Some authors have attributed to him a learned work upon the antiquities of his native country. Flourished in the 5th century.

TESSIER, Antoine, tai'-se-ai, a French writer, who, at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, went to Prussia, where he was appointed historiographer, and obtained a pension. His most important works are, "Panegyrics on Learned Men;" catalogue, in Latin, of all the authors who wrote indices, catalogues, &c.; and translations from St. Chrysostom, Calvin, St. Clement, Sleide, &c. b. at Montpellier, 1632; d. at Berlin, 1715.

TEKELI, Emeric, Count de, tai-lai'-ke, a Hungarian nobleman, who took the command of his countrymen in their struggle to throw off the yoke of Austria. He defeated the imperialists in several battles; but, after many vicissitudes, was compelled to seek an asylum in Turkey, and died at Constantinople. b. 1658; d. 1705.

TEKIN, Alp, te'-kin, the founder of the Gaznavide dynasty, who was at first a Turcoman slave. He was appointed governor of Khorasan; but revolted against his monarch, and took Gazna Ghizni, or Ghuznee, in 961, which he made his capital, and from which the dynasty he founded took its name. d. 975.

TELEMANN, George Philip, tel'-e-man, eminent German musician, who early in gave promise of that future excellence composer which his performances during hood fulfilled. As composer to the Theatre at Hamburg, he produced thirty operas; and, according to Dr. Burney, composed 600 overtures. He was the companion of the great Handel during the student days of the young men. Although few of his works are generally known in England, they are admitted by competent critics to abound in beauties. b. at Magdeburg, 1681; d. 1767.

TELFORD, Thomas, tel'-ford, a celebrated Scotch civil engineer, who was the son of a shepherd in Dumfriesshire, and, after receiving some little education in the parish school of Wester Kirk, was, in his 14th year, apprenticed to a stonemason. He continued to work at this business in the rural districts of Scotland, and at Edinburgh, until about the year 1782, when he repaired to London, and found employment upon the quadrangle of Somerset House, then in course of erection under Sir William Chambers. Devoting his spare time to the study of architecture and drawing, he was, in 1784, intrusted with the construction of a house for the resident commissioner in Portsmouth dockyard. He remained there during three years, gaining considerable experience relative to the engineering works of a dockyard. His talents were discerned by some members of the Johnstone family, who resided near his native place, and, through their influence, he was appointed to superintend some alterations in the castle, and afterwards to build a gaol at Shrewsbury. He was now fairly launched upon that career in which he won fame. After being engaged to erect more than forty bridges, he was, about 1793, appointed civil engineer to the Ellesmere Canal Company, to connect the Severn, the Dee, and the Mersey, by a number of navigations. The Caledonian Canal, the Glasgow, Paisley, and Ardrossan, the Lacclesfield, the Birmingham and Liverpool Union, the Weaver Navigation in Cheshire, were, at a subsequent period, either entirely or partially constructed by him. The Gotha Canal, in Sweden, was also his work. In 1802 he was appointed engineer to the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges; and of the great works executed by him in this capacity, he himself said, that "the whole of Scotland, from its southern boundary near Carlisle to the northern extremity of Caithness, and from Aberdeenshire on the east to the Argyshire islands on the west, has been intersected by roads; its largest rivers, and even inferior streams, crossed by bridges; and all this in the space of twenty-five years, and, with some few exceptions, under the same individual commissioners." The improvement of harbours, and the erection of Highland churches and mansees, were also included in the foregoing commission. The improved road from London to Holyhead, the Menai suspension-bridge, St. Katherine's docks, London, and the harbour-works at Aberdeen and Dundee, are held to be his greatest triumphs as an engineer. He left an account of all his undertakings, in a work which was finished and published by his executors after his death, entitled "Life of Thomas Telford, Civil Engineer, written by himself: containing a Descriptive Narrative of his Professional Labours;" to which a supplementary volume, containing eighty-three plates of his engineering works, was added. In early life he wrote some poetical pieces in imitation of Ramsay and Ferguson, which were inserted, under the signature of Eskdale Tam, in Ruddiman's "Weekly Magazine." In later years he wrote articles on Architecture, Civil Architecture, and Inland Navigation, for Brewster's "Edinburgh Encyclopedia." He was never married, and, until his 70th year, had never known any serious illness. He left £2000 to be awarded in annual premiums by the Institution of Civil Engineers, and £1000 to the minister of his native parish, for the establishment and continual supply of books to a library there. He was a fellow of the Royal Societies of Edinburgh and England. b. in Eskdale, Dumfriesshire, 1757; d. in London, 1834.

TELL, William, tel, one of the principal confederates who restored the independence of Switzerland in 1307. Gessler, the Austrian governor for the emperor Albert, placed the dual hat of his master upon a pole, which was set up in the market-place at Altorf, and all who passed were required to make obeisance to it. This was refused by Tell, who was sentenced to shoot an arrow at an apple placed on the head of his own son. He fortunately succeeded in cleaving the apple without injuring the child. Gessler observing another arrow in his girdle, asked what it was for; to which Tell boldly replied, "To have slain thee, if I had killed my son." The governor, upon this, ordered Tell to be bound and put into a boat, in order to convey him to a dungeon in his own castle. But a storm coming on, the boatmen declared they should be lost if Tell, who was accounted the best pilot on the lake, was not intrusted with the helm. On this Gessler ordered him to be released, and Tell, steering for a point of land since called the Rock of Tell, jumped ashore and gained the mountains. Shortly after, he shot the governor, and the confederates having taken arms, effected the deliverance of their country. This romantic story, however, is considered as fabulous by Johann von Müller, Grimm, and other writers. b. at Bürglen, in Uri.

TELLEZ, William Abraham, tel'-ler, an eminent German Protestant theologian, who became professor at Helmstädt; but, having published some works which were considered as heterodox, he was deprived of the appointment. He established himself at Berlin in 1787, and there received the post of member of the Consistorial Court. He wrote a number of works upon theology, in German, and some dissertations in Latin. "Equally remote from mysticism on the one hand, and from dry metaphysical philosophy on the other, he addresses himself to the reason and the heart, and, while he touches the latter, carries conviction to the former." b. at Leipzig, 1734; d. at Berlin, 1804.

TELLEZ, Balthazar, tel'-luis, an eminent historian, who was professor of theology, belles-lettres, and philosophy, in various colleges belonging to the Society of Jesuits, of which order he was a member. His most important works are, the "History of the Jesuits in Portugal," and the "History of Ethiopia." b. at Lisbon, 1595; d. at the same city, 1875.

TELLEZ, Gabriel, tel'-laiz, a celebrated Spanish dramatist, who takes rank immediately after Calderon and Lope de Vega. He is said to have written more than three hundred plays, the greater number of which were destroyed at the order of the Inquisition. He always wrote under an assumed name, being of the clerical profession, and his comedies being marked by considerable licence both in words and morals. b. at Madrid, probably in 1555; d. 1648.

TELLIER, Michel le, tel'-le-ai, a French lawyer and statesman, and father of the Marquis de Louvois, who gained unenviable notoriety by proposing the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. After passing through different offices, he was recommended by Cardinal Mazarin to Louis XIII. for the place of secretary of state, which post he filled with considerable reputation till 1668, when he resigned it to his son. b. at Paris, 1603; d. 1638.

TELLIER, François Michel le. (See Louvois, Marquis de.)

TEMANZA, Thomas, tai-man'-dza, an eminent Italian architect and writer upon architecture, who constructed the church of La Maddalena at Venice, the Rotunda at Piazzolo, &c. He was the author of "Lives of the most eminent Venetian Architects and Sculptors;" "Civil Architecture;" the "Antiquities of Rimini;" and a number of dissertations upon various branches of architecture. He became chief of the Commission of Inquirers at Venice. b. at Venice, 1705; d. at the same city, 1789.

TEMMINCK, C. J., tem'-mink, an eminent Dutch naturalist, who became director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences at Haarlem. His most important works were, "Systematic Catalogue of Ornithology," "Manual of Ornithology," an "Atlas of Birds," and an account of some new species of birds in the museum of the Linnæan Society. This last paper was inserted in the "Transactions" of the Linnæan Society. To the family of pigeons he devoted considerable attention, and produced thereon a valuable work, entitled "Natural History of Pigeons." b. about 1780; d. about 1860.

TEMPELHOFF, George Frederick, temp'-el-hof, a German officer, author of "The Prussian Bombardier," "The Elements of Military Tactics," the "History of the Seven Years' War," &c.

Tempesta

In the beginning of the revolutionary war with France, he had the command of all the Prussian artillery; and, in 1802, received the order of the Red Eagle from Frederick William III., who nominated him lieutenant-general and military tutor to his brothers. b. 1787; d. 1807.

TEMPESTA, Antonio, tem-pes-ta, an eminent painter, who was the disciple of Strada, and excelled in landscapes with figures. He also etched a large number of subjects. b. at Florence, 1555; d. at the same city, 1630.

TEMPESTA, Peter, whose real name was Moly, but who received the soubriquet of Tempesta from his frequent delineation of storms and shipwrecks, was a native of Haarlem. He went to Rome, and on changing his religion was made a chevalier; but was condemned to be hanged for the murder of his wife, which sentence was changed to perpetual imprisonment. After remaining in confinement 16 years, he effected his escape. b. 1637; d. 1701.

TEMPLE, William, tem'-pel, an eminent English statesman and diplomatist, who at the Restoration became a member of the Irish Convention; but in 1663 repaired to England. He rendered important services as ambassador to the United Provinces, particularly in effecting the league between England, Holland, and Sweden in 1678, known as the Triple Alliance, and in bringing about the marriage of the Prince of Orange (afterwards William III.) with Mary, daughter of the duke of York. In 1680 he retired from public affairs, and divided his time between his books and his gardens; but he was often consulted by the ministers, and by King William in person. His works consist of Memoirs, Letters, Miscellanies, and "Observations on the United Provinces of the Netherlands." "He was," says Sir J. Mackintosh, "a most admirable person. He seems to be the model of a negotiator, uniting politeness and address to honesty." b. in London, 1628; d. 1699.

TEMPLE, Frederick, D.D., was educated at Blundell's Grammar School, Tiverton, and Balliol College, Oxford. He took a double first-class in 1842, was made a fellow of his college and in 1846 took holy orders. He became principal of Kneller Hall Training College in 1848, and was elected head master of Rugby school in 1853. He contributed to the book known as "Essays and Reviews," which caused much opposition to be shown to his appointment as Bishop of Exeter in 1869. b. Nov. 30, 1821.

TENON, Claudine Alexandrine Guérin de, ten'-a, was the sister of Cardinal de Tencin, and took the veil in the monastery of Montfleury; but, with the consent of the pope, she threw off the religious habit and entered the gay world at Paris, where she led the fashion for some time, and was celebrated for her intrigues, for which she was once confined in the Châtelet, and afterwards in the Bastille. She was the mother of the celebrated French philosopher D'Alembert, whom she abandoned in his infancy. "The Siege of Calais, or the Misfortunes of Love," and some other romances, were written by her. b. 1681; d. 1749.

TENERANI, Pietro, ten'-er-a'-nie, an eminent Italian sculptor, who pursued his studies under Canova and Thorwaldsen. He executed a large number of statues and other pieces of sculpture for her Majesty Queen Victoria, the duke of Devonshire, the emperor of Russia, the late king of Naples, as well as for several cities of the United States. He was appointed professor of sculpture in the Academy of St. Luke at Rome, and was knighted by King Louis of Bavaria. b. about 1799.

TENIERS, David, ten'-e-ers, called the Elder, an eminent Dutch painter, who studied under Rubens, after which he went to Rome, where he imitated the manner of Elsheimer. He returned to Antwerp after ten years' absence in Italy. His subjects are alchemists, country fairs, alehouses, and merry meetings, all of them painted in an admirable style. b. at Antwerp, 1582; d. at the same city, 1649.

TENIERS, David, called the Younger, a celebrated Dutch painter, and son of the preceding, whom he surpassed, painted night-scenes, feasts, the "Temptation of St. Anthony," &c. His pieces are numerous and very valuable. The National Gallery contains four of his paintings. b. at Antwerp, 1610; d. at Brussels, 1694.

TENISON, Thomas, ten'-i-son, an eminent English prelate, who was educated at the free school of Norwich; whence he removed to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees. In 1680 he was presented to the rectory of St. Martin in the Fields, and in 1689 to the archdeaconry of London. He was so strenuous an advocate for the Protestant cause in the reign of James II., that King William advanced him to the bishopric of Lincoln in 1691, and to the see of Canterbury in 1694. He wrote some sermons, tracts against popery, and published the "Remains of Lord Chancellor Bacon." He founded a library and school in St. Martin's parish. This library, after remaining for many years in a neglected condition, was sold by auction in 1861. b. at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, 1638; d. in London, 1715.

TENNANT, Smithson, ten'-nant, an eminent English chemist, who, after studying under Dr. Black at Edinburgh, and at the university of Cambridge, set out upon a course of European travel, which embraced France, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. After taking a degree as bachelor of physic at Cambridge in 1788, he went to London; but, as he enjoyed an independent fortune, did not practise. In 1813 he was appointed professor of chemistry in the university of Cambridge; but, in the following year, while visiting a small fort near Boulogne, with Baron Bulow, he and his companion were thrown into the ditch. The baron escaped with the most trifling injuries, but Mr. Tennant's skull was so severely fractured, that he died within an hour after the accident. His most important contributions were furnished to the "Philosophical Transactions;" these were chiefly on the decomposition of fixed air; on the nature of the diamond; on the action of nitre upon gold and platinum; on an easier mode of procuring potassium, and on the different sorts of lime used in agriculture. b. at Selby, Yorkshire, 1761; d. 1815.

TENNANT, William, a Scotch poet, who studied for a short time at the university of St. Andrews. He was so unfortunate as to lose the use of his feet while still young. Unaided, he taught himself German, Portuguese, Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldaic, and other languages. After spending many years as a schoolmaster and classical teacher, he in 1835 received the appointment of professor of Oriental languages in the university of St. Andrews. He wrote three dramas, exhibiting considerable poetical power; the well-known poem of "Anster Fair,"

TENNEMANN, Wilhelm Gottlieb, ten'-ne-man, an eminent German philosophical writer, who became professor of philosophy and librarian at the university of Marburg. He made a German translation of Hume "On the Human Understanding," and of Locke's essay upon the same subject. His most important work was, "Comparative History of the Systems of Philosophy," which has been reproduced under the title of "A Manual of Philosophy," in Bohn's Philological Library, and edited and enlarged by J. R. Morell. The same work has been translated into French by Victor Cousin. b. 1761; p. 1819.

TENNENT, Sir James Emerson, ten'-nent, a modern statesman and writer, who, after concluding his educational career at Trinity College, Dublin, repaired to Greece, whither he had been attracted by an ardent sympathy for the cause of Greek independence. Three eloquent and remarkable works resulted from this journey—"Greece in 1825," "Letters from the Ægean," and the "History of Modern Greece," the last of which contained some curious details relative to the establishment of the monarchy. Shortly after the appearance of the last work, he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but never practised. Until 1832 he had borne only his paternal name of Emerson; but having in the previous year married the daughter and heiress of William Tennent, a wealthy banker of Belfast, he, upon succeeding to the estates of that gentleman, assumed the additional name of Tennent. In the latter year he entered the House of Commons as member for Belfast, which he represented with little interruption until 1845, when he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed civil secretary to the colonial government of Ceylon. At a subsequent period he became Lieutenant-governor of Ceylon. After his return to England he was, in 1852, returned member for Lisburn, and received the appointment of secretary to the Poor-Law Board, an office which he resigned to accept that of joint secretary to the Board of Trade. His active parliamentary and official life did not prevent his frequently appearing as the author of valuable works, the chief of which were, "A Treatise on the Copyright of Designs for Printed Fabrics," "Christianity in Ceylon," and "Wine, its Uses and Taxation." In 1859 he produced his "Ceylon," which speedily became one of the most popular works of the day, and was translated into several foreign languages. It is distinguished among even the best works of its class for its correct and extensive series of observations upon natural history. Upon the habits of one animal—the elephant—the book throws a world of light; and so greatly is our knowledge of this gigantic quadruped increased, that it is not too much to say of the book, that, until its appearance, we were but dimly acquainted with, perhaps, the most interesting animal of the brute creation. In the House of Commons he distinguished himself by carrying the Copyright of Designs Act, for which boon the manufacturers of the United Kingdom presented him, in 1843, with a testimonial and a service of plate of the value of £3000. b. at Belfast, 1804.

TENNYSON, Alfred, ten'-ni-son, a distinguished modern English poet, who was the son of the Rev. Dr. George Clayton Tennyson, rector of Somersby, Lincolnshire. The poet was descended of the illustrious families of Lascelles, Clayton, the D'Eyncourts, and other Norman and Saxon lines. While at the university of Cambridge, he wrote a poem entitled "Timbuctoo," which, in 1823, gained the chancellor's medal. Shortly afterwards he produced, in conjunction with his brother Charles, a small volume of poems, which is stated to have been commended by Coleridge. His first effort of any consequence was in 1830, when he put forth a collection of poems, chiefly lyrical, which contained, among other pieces, "Mariana," "Lilian," "The Mermaid," "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," "The Dying Swan," "All Things will Die," "Mero to Leander," "The Ballad of Oriana," and "The Sea-fairies." "Poems by Alfred Tennyson" appeared in 1833, and contained, in addition to several of his former productions improved and altered, "The Miller's Daughter," "The Lotus-Eaters," "Locksley Hall," "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," "The Talking Oak," &c. This volume showed that the poet had taken a great stride. "With the publication of this series," says an eminent critic, "Mr. Tennyson appears distinctly as the poet of his own age. His apprenticeship over, his mastery over the instruments of his art is complete, and he employs it in either presenting the life of his contemporaries, the thoughts, incidents, and emotions of the nineteenth century in England, or in treating legend and history with reference to the moral and intellectual sympathies now active amongst us." "The Princess" was given to the public—a public now expectantly appreciative of everything that came from the poet—in 1847. "In Memoriam" followed,—a glorious tribute to the memory of Arthur Hallam, the son of the historian. Shortly after the appearance of this grand elegy, or rather series of elegies, Mr. Tennyson was appointed poet-laureate; to the trifling salary attached to which post was added a pension of £200 per annum. The "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" appeared in 1852, "Maud" in 1855, "The Idylls of the King" in 1858, and "Enoch Arden" in 1864. A gorgeously illustrated edition of his poems has been published, upon which the best artists of the time have been employed. In 1856 he was created D.C.L. of the University of Oxford. Some parts of the "Idylls of the King" have been published separately with illustrations, by the eminent French artist, Gustave Doré. b. at Somersby, Lincolnshire, 1810.

TENON, Jacques René, ten'-awng, a celebrated French surgeon, who studied botany under the eminent Antoine and Bernard Jussieu; and, after concluding his scientific education, established himself in practice; but, in 1744, joined the army as surgeon of the first rank. He subsequently rose to the highest reputation, and was appointed member of the Royal Academy of Surgery, a member of the Institute, and was created a member of the Legion of Honour. He was the author of more than thirty works upon medical science, the most important of which were, "Memoirs relative to Anatomy, Pathology, and Surgery," and "Memoirs upon the Hospitals of Paris." His last work, put forth when he was in his 90th year, was entitled, "On the Means of Prolonging Life." b. 1724; p. 1816.

TENTERDEN, Charles Abbott, Lord, ten'-ter-

den, an eminent English judge, was the son of a barber at Canterbury, who was "a tall, erect, and primitive-looking man, with a large club pigtail, going about with the instruments of his business, and attended frequently by his son Charles, a youth as decent, grave, and primitive-looking as himself." In 1781 young Abbott was elected to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. In 1788 he entered himself of the Inner Temple. After commencing the active pursuit of his profession, he quickly rose to great eminence; was appointed counsel to the Treasury, the Bank, and several large mercantile companies. In 1816 he accepted a judgeship in the court of Common Pleas, having, previously refused a like mark of distinction, his income as a counsel being far beyond the salary of a judge. He was knighted in 1818, and in the same year succeeded Lord Ellenborough as chief-justice of the court of King's Bench. In that capacity Lord Brougham describes him as follows:—"It was an edifying sight to observe Lord Tenterden, whose temper had been visibly affected during the trial (for on the bench he had not always that entire command of it which he possessed at the bar), addressing himself to the points in the case with the same perfect calmness and indifference with which a mathematician pursues an abstract truth; as if there were neither the parties nor the advocates in existence, and only bent on the discovery and the elucidation of truth." In 1827 he was created a peer, with the title of Baron Tenterden. As a speaker in the House of Lords, he opposed the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, and the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. He was the author of a treatise upon the law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen, which is stated to be the best work upon that subject B. at Canterbury, 1762; D. 1832.

TENTORI, Christopher, ten-to-re, a learned Italian writer, who produced a "History of the Republic of Venice," and several other works upon the same subject. B. 1745; D. 1810.

TENZEL, or TEXTZEL, Wilhelm Ernest, tent-zeel, a learned German historian and antiquary, whose principal works were, "Saxonia Antiquissima," "Continuation of Sagittarius's History of Gotha," and "History of the Reformation." B. at Greussen, Thuringia, 1659; D. 1717.

TERAMO, James de, tai-ra-mo, an Italian writer, frequently styled Palladino, was at first an advocate, but afterwards entered into holy orders, and became archbishop of Tarentum. He wrote, among other works, a curious romance, entitled "The Trial of Bellal," B. 1849; D. 1417.

TER BURG, Gerard, ter-berg, a Dutch painter, was employed at the court of Spain, where he became wealthy, and was made a knight. On his return to his own country he settled at Deventer, and was chosen burgomaster. He painted portraits, conversations, and humorous scenes. B. at Zwoll, Holland, 1608; D. 1681.

TERENCE, Publius Terentius Afer, ter-ence, a dramatic poet, who, according to Suetonius, was a native of Carthage, and was sold as a slave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, who gave him his liberty on account of his genius. He studied Greek with such assiduity as to adapt the best comedies from that language into the Latin; of which, however, only six remain. The best edition of Terence is that of Bentley, Amsterdam, 1727. Dunlop, in his

"Roman Literature," has given some imitations of his plays. There is an English translation of the comedies, by George Colman. According to one account, he is said to have died of grief, on hearing that 108 plays of Menander, which he had translated while in Greece, and had dispatched to Rome, were lost at sea; while others state that he expired whilst on a voyage from Asia. Lived between 218 B.C., and 149 B.C.

TERENTIA, te-ren'-shi-a, the wife of Cicero, who repudiated her because she had been faithless while he was in banishment in Asia. She married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Messala Corvinus. She lived to her 103rd, or, according to Pliny, to her 117th year.

TERNAUX, Guillaume Louis, Baron, tain'-no, a celebrated French manufacturer, who was among the first to introduce spinning-machines into France. He also suggested plans for the preservation of corn in subterraneous caverns instead of granaries, and acclimatized the Thibet sheep in France. B. 1763; D. 1833.

TERPANDER, ter-pän'-der, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos. It is said that he appeased a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes. He added three strings to the lyre, which, before his time, had only four. Supposed to have flourished about 650 B.C.

TERRASSON, Jean, ter-ras-sawng, a French divine and writer, who, in 1707, was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1721 obtained the professorship of philosophy, Greek, and Latin. His most important works are, "Critical Dissertations on the Iliad" (this has been translated into English); "Reflections in Favour of Law's System" (this was a defence of the Mississippi project); "Sethos," a moral romance, in imitation of Fénelon's "Telemaachus;" a translation of Diodorus Siculus. B. at Lyons, 1670; D. at Paris, 1750.

TERRASSON, Antoine, an eminent French lawyer, who was cousin of the preceding. He distinguished himself as an advocate, and composed, by order of the chancellor L'Aguesseau, the "History of Roman Jurisprudence," for which he was named censor-royal, and professor in the Royal College. Besides the above work, he wrote "Miscellanées" in history and literature. B. at Paris, 1705; D. 1782.

TERTULLIAN, Quintus Septimus Florens, ter-tul'-li-an, one of the fathers of the Church, was, according to St. Jerome, a native of Carthage, and the son of a centurion in the employ of the Roman proconsul. He became an eminent rhetorician, and was at first a pagan; but the constancy of the martyrs converted him to Christianity, which he defended with great zeal and eloquence. From Carthage he went to Rome, and in the persecution under Severus, he drew up a famous apology for the Christians. In the latter part of his life he fell into the errors of Montanism. The best editions of Tertullian's works are those of Rigaltius and of Semler. St. Jerome thus speaks of his writings:—"What more learned—more acute than Tertullian, whose 'Apology,' and books against the heathen, embrace all the learning of the age!" B. about 160; D. about 225.

TERWESTEN, Augustin, ter-ven'-ten, a Dutch painter, who improved himself in Italy, where he studied the works of the best masters. By his means the Academy at the Hague was revived, and that at Berlin instituted. B. at the Hague, 1649; D. at Berlin, 1711.—He had two brothers, Elias and Matthew. The first excelled in painting fruits and flowers, and died in 1724; the other painted historical subjects, and died in 1735.

TESTI, Fulvio, tes'-te, an eminent Italian poet, and accounted the Horace of modern Italy. He became minister of state to the Duke of Modena; but, being accused of treason, was imprisoned. b. at Ferrara, 1593; d. 1646.

TERZEL, John, ter'-zel, a Dominican monk of the 16th century, who, being appointed in 1517 to vend the indulgences issued by Pope Leo X. for the completion of St. Peter's church at Rome, represented them as sufficient for the pardon of all sins, past, present, and future. This first roused the indignation of Luther, and may be said to have been the primary cause of the Reformation. The papal government, seeing the mischief likely to accrue from the indiscreet zeal of Terzel, severely rebuked him. He returned to his convent at Leipsic in 1518, and died of the plague in the following year.

THACKERAY, William Makepeace, thak'-e-ray, a distinguished English novelist, who came of an old Yorkshire family, and was the son of a gentleman in the civil service of the East India Company. Born in the East, the future novelist was sent at an early age to England, and received his first education at the Charterhouse school, afterwards passing to the university of Cambridge, where he had as contemporaries the poet Tennyson, J. M. Kemble, the eminent Saxon scholar, and other young men who subsequently became famous in literature and science. Quitting his "alma mater" without a degree, and in the enjoyment of a respectable fortune, he formed the resolution of studying pictorial art as a profession. With this view he repaired to the continent, and spent some time at Weimar, where he made the acquaintance of Götthe. His artist life was continued until between his 25th and 30th years, when he relinquished the crayon for the pen. From the commencement of his literary career he appears to have exhibited high qualities as a writer. His progress to popularity was nevertheless slow. He is understood to have been employed upon the "Times" newspaper while under the editorship of Barnes; but it was in consequence of his success as a contributor to "Fraser's Magazine" that he became recognised as a witty, elegant, and original writer. His articles in this publication were signed "Michael Angelo Titmarsh;" and, under the same characteristic pseudonym, he produced, separately, "The Paris Sketch-Book;" "The Second Funeral of Napoleon;" in three letters to Miss Smith, of London; and the "Chronicle of the Drum." As Michael Angelo Titmarsh, he also put forth "The Great Hoggarty Diamond;" "Notes of a Journey from Cornwall to Grand Cairo;" and a series of Christmas books, entitled "Our Street," "Dr. Birch and his Young Friends," "Mrs. Perkins's Ball," "Rebecca and Rowena," and "The Kickleburys on the Rhine," to the second edition of which last he added a reply to a captious critic in the "Times," who charged him with seeing only hard, selfish, and unamiable people in this world. His general recognition as a great English writer may be said to date from the time of his publishing his first serial novel, "Vanity Fair; or, a Novel without a Hero." But though the public had been long in making the discovery that a great and original genius was catering for it, it now hastened to award him a position in the same rank with the first novelist of the time, Mr. Charles Dickens. Mr. Thackeray's reputation was fully maintained by his subsequent works; everybody being charmed by his wit, his beautiful style,—so easy, yet so strong,—so full of art, but of art so delightfully concealed. "The History of Pendennis," "The History of Henry Esmond," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians,"—each work was read with grateful avidity by the countrymen of their author. His historical studies for the novel of "Henry Esmond," the action of which, being laid in the time of Queen Anne, naturally included Addison, Steele, and the wits of that day, in the list of characters, would seem to have been the original foundation for those brilliant lectures upon the English humourists which he delivered in London, the provinces, and in the United States of America. Several works which have been left unnamed in the preceding list were republished in an edition of his "Miscellanies;" a collection which included his early contributions to "Fraser's Magazine" and "Punch,"—notably, "Jeames's Diary," the "Snob Papers," and the essays of a "Fat Contributor." In England, Scotland, and the United States during his second visit

"Marazine," a cheap and highly-popular magazine, of which he became the editor on its establishment in 1860. In 1857 he presented himself as a candidate for the representation of the city of Oxford in Parliament; but was rejected by that constituency in favour of Mr. Cardwell. His last work was "Donis Duval;" which was unfinished at his death, being then in course of publication in the Cornhill Magazine. A handsome library edition of his collected works with the original illustrations, drawn by himself, was published in 1867-69. b. at Calcutta, 1811; d. in London, 1863.

THACKWELL, Lieutenant-general Sir Joseph, G.C.B. and K.H., colonel 16th Lancers, thak'-well, served in the latter part of the Irish rebellion; but obtaining a cornetcy in the 15th Hussars in 1800, he remained in that corps for 31 years, during the last eleven of which he held the command. He went to Spain with Sir John Moore, and was present at Corunna. At the battle of Vittoria he was severely wounded: at Waterloo he lost his left arm, and had two horses shot under him. In India he served with great distinction, commanding the cavalry in the first Affghan, as well as in the Gwalior and the two Sikh campaigns. b. 1731; d. 1859.

THALBERG, Sigismund, thal'-berg, a distinguished modern German pianist and musical composer, who was educated under Hummel. In his 15th year he appeared with success as a performer, and, in his 16th, published some excellent musical compositions. In Paris, London, and Vienna, he achieved the highest success as a pianist, and exercised a large amount of influence over the formation of the modern method of performing upon the pianoforte. He composed variations and fantasias upon the operas of "The Huguenots," "Don Giovanni," "La Donna del Lago," &c. His "Studies for the Pianoforte" are highly esteemed, and, of all the modern masters, he was most successful in training pupils. b. 1812.

THALES, thal'-lee, a philosopher of antiquity, who, after traveling many years, particularly in Egypt, where he studied mathematics, returned to his native place, and founded a school of philosophy, generally styled the Ionian school. Among his disciples were Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Pythagoras, and he was often visited by Solon and Thrasybulus. He is generally allowed to have been the father of the Greek philosophy, and stands first on the list of the seven wise men. His doctrine was, that water is the first principle of all bodies; and, according to Diogenes, he was a believer in a deity pervading the universe. He made some inventions in geometry, and first observed the apparent diameter of the sun. He likewise observed the nature and course of eclipses. b. at Miletus, 640 B.C.; d. about 545 B.C.

THAMASP, TAMASP, or THAMAS I., tha'-mas, sof of Persia, was the son of Shah Ismail, and ascended the throne in 1523. He defeated the Usbeks, took Bagdad in 1529, and conquered Shirvan in 1538. He suppressed a revolt which his two brothers had excited against his authority, and recovered, from the Ottomans, Bagdad and the surrounding territory, as well as Kars, which had been for a short period under the domination of that power. b. 1514; poisoned, 1576.

THAMASP or TAMASP II., twelfth sof of Persia, ascended the throne in 1729. Attacked on all sides by the Affghans, the Russians, and the Turks, he was enabled, at first, to retain his throne by the aid of Nadir Shah, who, after defeating the Affghans, whose king he put to death, turned his arms against and deposed Thamasp, in 1732. b. about 1698; supposed to have been killed, 1737.

THAMASP, or TAMASP-KOULI-KHAN. (See NADIR SHAH.)

THEDEX, John Christian Antony, tai'-den, a celebrated German surgeon, who entered the army of the king of Prussia as surgeon, and, during the military operations of the Seven Years' War, displayed so much skill in his profession, that Frederick promoted him to the post of chief military surgeon. After thirty years' service, he commenced writing a series of works upon surgery, which bear the impress of his long experience, and are highly esteemed. The theoretical portion of them, however, being based upon an antiquated principle, is less valuable. b. 1714; d. 1707.

THELLUSON, Peter Isaac, thel'-lus-on, a native of Geneva, who settled as a merchant in London, where he acquired a prodigious fortune, and who, at his death, in 1797, left about £100,000 to his family, and the remainder of his property, considerably above half a million, was to accumulate to a certain period, when, if there were none of his descendants and name existing, the whole was to be applied by Parliament towards paying off the national debt. The family endeavoured to set aside the will in Chancery, but without success; and it was not until 1859, after sixty years of litigation, that the "great Thellusson will-case," the oldest lawsuit on record, was decided.

THELWALL, John, thel'-wall, an English writer, who, after spending some time in the study of the law, relinquished it for literature. He commenced his career by publishing a volume of poems, which were well received, and afterwards became editor of a magazine. Master of a ready and attractive style, he joined with Horne Tooke and other political orators of the time, and gained so great a reputation by his boldness as a political reformer, that he was included with Horne Tooke and Thomas Hardy in an indictment for high treason. After a trial of five days, he was acquitted, whereupon he retired to Wales; but, in 1801, commenced as lecturer and tutor in elocution. In the cure of stammering he was also highly successful, communicating some valuable papers upon the subject to the "Medical and Physical Journal" and the "Monthly Magazine." He was the author of "Poems written in the Tower and in Newgate;" "The Tribune;" "Political Miscellanies;" "A Letter on Stammering;" "The Peripatetic;" and a novel called "The Daughter of Adoption." b. in London, 1704; d. 1834.

THEMISON, them'-is-on, a celebrated Greek physician, who was the disciple of Asclepiades, and, departing from the old system, formed a medical sect called Methodici, which was opposed to that of the Empirici. Flourished in the 1st century before Christ.

THEMISTIS, the-mis'-ti-us, a Greek orator and philosopher, who acquired so high a reputation that, though a pagan, Theodosius the Great appointed him tutor to his son Arcadius, previously to which he had been nominated by Julian prefect of Constantinople. He was very intimate with St. Gregory Nazianzen. He wrote commentaries on the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle: the last only is extant. There remain some of his discourses. Flourished in the 4th century.

THEMISTOCLES, the-mis'-to-klee-s, a celebrated Athenian general, who signalized himself by his courage and address in early life, and fought bravely at Marathon, under Miltiades. When Xerxes invaded Greece, in 480 B.C., Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was intrusted to his command. The jealous rivalry of the generals in command of the allied Grecian fleet would have proved fatal to the cause, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and nominated his rival, Eurymedon, as head of the expedition. The Persian fleet was somewhat distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but it was owing to Themistocles that a decisive battle was subsequently fought; for the Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make a stand at sea against the enemy; Themistocles, however, sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet in the Bay of Salamis, prevented their escape, and obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, 480 B.C., was decisive, the Greeks obtaining the victory. Further to insure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch, that the Greeks had conspired to cut down the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. Xerxes hastened from Greece, left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the Greeks. Upon his return, Themistocles was received with the greatest honours, and, by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, the city was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet, in the midst of this glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen. He was banished from the city, and obliged to seek the protection of a monarch whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes received the illustrious Athenian with kindness, made him one of his greatest favourites, and, according to oriental custom, bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. But Themistocles still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and, according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by poison, or drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain. His remains were conveyed to Attica, and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who too late repented of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. B. about 514 B.C.; D. about 419 B.C.

THEMISTOGENES, the-mis-toj'-e-nee, a Greek historian, referred to by Xenophon as the author of an account of the expedition of Cyrus. It is, however, conjectured that Xenophon alluded to his own history—the "Anabasis," as the work of another writer.

THEMARD, Louis Jacques, Baron, tain'-ar, a celebrated French chemist, who in his 20th year became demonstrator in chemistry at the Polytechnic School at Paris. He subsequently rose to the position of professor of chemistry in the College of France. Charles X. created him a baron in 1824. In 1833 he was nominated a peer of France, having in the meanwhile been appointed professor in the university. One of the most distinguished chemists in the early portion of the 19th century, he was the author, among other valuable works, of "Physico-Chemical Researches," "Elementary Treatise on Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical," which latter is one of the best works of its kind, and has been reproduced in the German language. He likewise enriched the scientific journals of France with treatises upon almost every department of chemistry. B. 1777; D. 1857.

THEOBALD, Louis, the'-o-bawld, an English dramatic author, who wrote several pieces of little merit. He is chiefly known by his edition of Shakspeare, which, though depreciated by Warburton, possesses considerable merit, and shows no want of judgment. As an editor of Shakspeare, he was vastly superior to Pope, whose edition he criticised in a pamphlet entitled "Shakspeare Restored; or, Specimens of Blunders committed and unamended in Pope's Edition." For this, Pope assailed Theobald with all his powers of ridicule, and made him the hero of the "Dunciad." Theobald revenged himself in an admirable way: he produced an edition of Shakspeare which extinguished the inaccurate one of Pope. Pope and Theobald afterwards became reconciled, and the former substituted Colley Cibber for Theobald, as the chief dunce in his satire. He was likewise the author of a Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, and some periodical papers inserted in a weekly journal of his time. B. at Sittingbourne, Kent, date unknown; D. 1744.

THEOBALDUS, or TREBALDUS, te-bal'-dus, a French prelate, who wrote a theological and didactic poem upon twelve animals—the lion, eagle, serpent, ant, fox, stag, spider, whale, centaur and siren, elephant, dove, and panther. After describing the habits of these animals, he proceeds to make a series of moral and religious speculations thereupon. The poem has likewise been attributed to Hildebert, archbishop of Tours. The title of the work, which was first printed at Antwerp in 1482, is "Physiologus de Naturis Duodecim Animalium."

THEOCRITUS, the-ok'-ri-tus, a Greek bucolic poet, of whom little is known beyond the fact that his friend and patron was Ptolemy Philadelphus. He is said to have been strangled by order of Hiero, King of Syracuse, for having written a satire against him. Of his various works, we have only his "Idylls," and some epigrams. Lived about 280 B.C.

THEODATUS, the-od'-a-tus, king of the Goths in Italy, was placed on the throne in 534, by his cousin Amalasontha, whom he married; but some time afterwards caused to be strangled. The emperor Justinian declared war against him, and Belisarius, his general, marched into Italy; on which the soldiers of Theodatus deposed him, and placed on the throne Vitiges, who put Theodatus to death, in 536.

THEODORE, the'-o-dore, an adventurer of low birth, who contrived to raise himself to the position of negus or emperor of Abyssinia. His name was originally Kassai, which he changed for that of Theodore on his accession to the throne, putting forth his claim, at the same time, to be a lineal descendant of Menilek, the reputed son of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. At first he entered the service of one of the petty princes of the country, but he gained possession of his territories, and ultimately of the greater part of Abyssinia by his intrigues with the leading chieftains and his manifest military genius, being crowned as emperor in 1855. He sought to enter into an alliance with England, but his overtures were misunderstood or neglected, and in revenge for the fancied slight, he imprisoned the British consul and several British officers and Europeans who had visited or settled in the country. Peaceful means having failed to procure their release, the government sent an expedition against Theodore in 1867-68. The Emperor gave up the prisoners and shot himself when the British troops captured Magdala, April 13, 1868. B. at Quard, in Western Amhara, about 1810.

THEODORIC, the-od'-o-rik, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, was the natural son of Theodimir, and was given as a hostage to the emperor Leo Magnus, in 481. He rendered great services to the emperor Zeno, who honoured him with the consulate in 484. He afterwards defeated and put to death Odoacer, and made himself master of all Italy. In 509 he espoused a sister of Clovis, king of the Franks. Theodoric displayed the qualities of a great prince. He regulated the administration of justice, allayed religious disputes, revised the laws, and encouraged commerce. B. 455; D. 526.

THEODORIC I., king of the Visigoths, succeeded Wallia in 420. During the interval 426 to 436, he made war upon the Romans three times, and attempted to take the city of Narbonne. He obtained territory both in Spain and Gaul, and subsequently became the ally of the Romans against Attila, whom he defeated at Châlons-sur-Marne in 451, but lost his life in the battle. His son Thorismund succeeded him.

THEODORIC II., son of Theodoric I., acquired the throne by the murder of his brother Thoris-mund, in 453, but was himself killed by Euric, another of the sons of Theodorio I. During his short reign he increased the empire of the Visigoths, and advanced almost as far as the Loire. Killed, 466.

THEODORUS OF MOPSUESTIA, the-od'-or named from the place of which he was bishop, a city in Cilicia. His works, which favour Nestorianism and Socinianism, were condemned in the fifth general council. What remains is a "Commentary on the Twelve Greater Prophets," and some fragments. He is held in great respect by the Syrian Christians. D. 429.

THEODORUS OF CYRENE, whose philosophy was so disliked, that he was banished from his native city. He repaired to Athens, and afterwards to Egypt, where he obtained the favour of Ptolemy Soter, who appointed him ambassador to Lysimachus. He was styled the Atheist, for having composed a work in which he denied the existence of the gods. He is regarded as one of the forerunners of Epicurus. Flourished towards the close of the 4th century B.C.

THEODORUS I. succeeded John IV. as bishop of Rome in 642. He excommunicated Paulus, patriarch of Constantinople, and condemned the heresy of the Monothelites. His successor was Martin I. D. 649.

THEODORUS LASCARIS, emperor of Nicæa. (See LASCARIS, Theodore.)

THEODORUS, or DIODORUS, bishop of Tarsus, defended the Catholic faith against the emperor Valens, who was an Arian, but became the favourite of Gratian. He was the author of works upon theology and morals, none of which are extant. D. about 394.

THEODORUS OF CÆSAREA was at first a monk at Jerusalem, but repairing to Constantinople about 535, obtained the favour of Justinian, and was nominated archbishop of Cæsarea. Afterwards he was excommunicated and deprived of his see.

THEODOSIUS I., the-o-dō'-si-us, a Roman emperor, surnamed the Great. His father, Theodosius, distinguished himself in Britain and Africa, but was beheaded by order of Valens in 376. The son was called to court by Gratian, associated with himself in the empire, and appointed governor of Thrace and those provinces which Valentinian had possessed in the East. He defeated the Goths in several actions, and compelled them to sue for peace. His fame spread into Persia, and Sapor III. solicited his alliance. In 385 a conspiracy was formed against him, but it was discovered, and Theodosius displayed the magnanimity of his disposition, by pardoning the criminals. But in 390 he tarnished his fame in causing the inhabitants of Thessalonica to be put to the sword, on account of an insurrection which had taken place in that city. St. Ambrose was so struck with horror by this transaction, that he refused to admit Theodosius into the church till he had performed penance during eight months. The emperor, having defeated Maximus, marched to Rome, where he received the honours of a triumph; after which he returned to Constantinople and defeated the barbarians who had ravaged Macedonia and Thrace. He then turned his arms against the usurper Eugenius, who had been placed on the throne after the murder of Valentinian. Having defeated him at Miletum, he caused him to be beheaded, in 394. He thus became emperor of the whole Roman world, and was preparing to reform the administration of his dominions by wise edicts, when his health gave way. Before his death he nominated his son Arcadius to the empire of the East, while that of the West was given to Honorius. B. 345; D. at Milan, 395.

THEODOSIUS II. was grandson of the preceding, and succeeded his father Arcadius, in 408, under the guardianship of his sister Pulcheria. She caused him to marry Athenais, daughter of Leontius, an Athenian philosopher, who, being baptized, took the name of Eudocia. Ardaburius, his general, defeated the Persians with great slaughter near the Euphrates; but Theodosius was less fortunate against the Huns, who overran the European provinces, so that the emperor was obliged to purchase a peace. Theodosius, throughout his life, was emperor only in name, the whole sovereignty being exercised by Pulcheria, his sister. During his reign, the celebrated code of laws known as the Theodosian code, was promulgated. B. 401; D. 450.

THEODOSIUS III. was nominated emperor of the East in succession to Anastasius II., in 715, by the troops of Anastasius. He at first refused the crown, but was forced to accept it. After a reign of one year he abdicated in favour of Leo III.

THEODOTUS, the-od'-o-tus, was a translation into Greek of the Old Testament. Flourished early in the 2nd century.

THEODOTUS OF BYZANTIUM, the-od'-o-tus, surnamed the Tanner, from his occupation. In the persecution under Marcus Aurelius he was arrested, and, to save his life, renounced the Christian religion. The faithful having reproached him for his apostasy, he invented the heretical notion that Christ was only a man. He was excommunicated, but obtained many followers, who were called Theodotians.

THEOGNIS, the-og'-nis, a Greek elegiac poet. There remain of his some fragments printed in the collection of comic poets by Aldus. B. at Megara, and flourished towards the close of the 6th century.

THEON, the'-on, a Greek sophist, who wrote a poetical treatise of rhetoric, entitled "Progy-nasmata." Flourished in the 4th century.

THEON, a celebrated Greek painter, who was accounted one of the first artists of his time. His paintings are alluded to by Pliny, Plutarch, and Ælian. Flourished under Philip and Alexander of Macedon.

THEON OF ALEXANDRIA, surnamed the Younger, a philosopher and mathematician in the time of Theodosius the Great, was father of the celebrated Hypatia. He wrote a Commentary on Euclid and on Aratus. Flourished in the 4th century.

THEON OF SMYRNA, surnamed the Elder, a Platonic philosopher, who is stated to have composed a work upon arithmetic, music, astronomy, and geometry, which has been lost. Flourished under Ptolemy.

THEOPHANES, George, the-af'-a-nees, a Greek historian, who entered into the monastic state, and was received with distinction at the seventh general council; but was exiled by the emperor Leo the Armenian. He wrote a chronicle beginning where Syncellus ends, and reaching to the reign of Michael Cæropalatus. D. 818.

THEOPHANES, Prokopovitch, a Russian historian, who became archbishop of Novgorod. He wrote the "Life of Peter the Great," and some theological treatises. b. 1681; d. 1786.

THEOPHANIA, empress of the East, the-of'-a-ne-a, was a woman of obscure birth, and having become the wife of Romanus II., evinced a treacherous and intriguing disposition. She poisoned her husband in 963, and placed her paramour Nicephorus Phocas upon the throne, whom she married, but caused to be assassinated, in order that she might espouse John Zimisces. The latter, however, banished Theophania shortly after being proclaimed emperor. She was recalled to Constantinople by her son Basil II., in 983.

THEOPHILUS, the-of'-i-lus, bishop of Antioch, was at first a heathen; but was converted to Christianity on reading the Bible. His "Defence of Christianity" was edited by Gesner, at Zurich, and is appended to the works of Justin. Flourished in the 2nd century.

THEOPHILUS, emperor of the East, was the son and successor of Michael II. He punished with great severity all who were implicated in the murder of Leo V.; was an iconoclast, and remained almost continually at war with the caliph Motassem, whose native city, Zapetra, in Syria, he destroyed. Motassem, however, revenged this insult by sacking Armorium, the birthplace of Theophilus. b. 842.

THEOPHILUS, a jurist of Constantinople, who, with Dorotheus and Trebonian, compiled the "Institutes of Justinian." Of this undertaking, he left an excellent paraphrase in Greek, which was discovered in the 16th century, at Louvain. Flourished in the 6th century.

THEOPHILUS PROTOSPATHARIUS, pro-to-s-path-a'-ri-us, a Greek writer upon medicine; five of whose treatises upon anatomy and physiology are extant. Nothing is known relative to his life. Supposed to have lived in the 7th century.

THEOPHILUS, surnamed the Monk and the Priest, a Latin writer, who composed a work upon painting on velvet, wood, and in fresco. The work also treated of mosaics, painting on glass, and gave some curious recipes for the mixing of colours. Lived in the 12th century.

THEOPHRASTUS, the-o'-fras-tus, a Greek philosopher. Plato was his first master; but he afterwards became a disciple of Aristotle, who had a great esteem for him, and gave him the surname of Theophrastus, "one who speaks divinely," his original name being Tyrtamus. He succeeded Aristotle in his school at Athens, and his name became so celebrated, that he was attended by two thousand pupils, who came from all parts of Greece. Only a few of his works are extant; the most important of them being, "History of Stones," of which Hill has given an English translation; "Treatise of Plants," and "Moral Characters;" these have also been translated into English. The best edition of his works is that of Aldus. b. at Eresus, in the island of Lesbos, about 370 b.c.; d. at Athens, at a very advanced age.

THEOPHYLACTUS, the-o'-fil-ac'-tus, archbishop of Achris, and metropolitan of Bulgaria in the 11th century. He wrote Commentaries on the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles; also on some of the minor prophets and Epistles.

THEODOCOULI, Dominic, the-o'-co'-u-li, an eminent painter, sculptor, and architect, who studied under Titian, is supposed to have been a Greek; but he settled at Toledo, and was engaged by Philip II. to decorate the

Thevenot

Escorial with his works. He designed several Spanish churches, and executed sculptures for them. b. at Toledo, 1625.—His son Manuel also achieved celebrity as a sculptor and architect. He designed a portion of the cathedral of Toledo. d. 1631.

THERAMENES, the-rám'-e-nees, an Athenian philosopher and general, was one of the thirty tyrants who assumed the government of Athens; but he opposed their cruelties; on which Critias, one of his colleagues, accused him of being an enemy to the state, and Theramenes was condemned to take poison, 404 b.c.

THEREESA, St., te-re'-sa, a Spanish lady who became a Carmelite nun, and was the reformer of the order, founding at Avila in 1562, a new society which bore the name of the Barefooted Carmelites. This "saint," who seems to have oscillated during early life between a liking for rigid devotion, and a zest for worldly frivolity, wrote an account of her life, detailing her intercourse with the spiritual world while on earth. b. in Castile, 1515; d. 1582.

THESIGER, Sir Frederick, thes'-i-ger, a modern English lawyer, who at first served as a midshipman in the royal navy, which he quitted to study the law. In 1818 he was called to the bar, and after rising to a large practice, and becoming the leader of the Home circuit, was nominated king's counsel in 1834. In 1840 he was returned to Parliament as member for Woodstock, for which place he sat until 1844, when, on being appointed solicitor-general under the Peel ministry, he became a candidate for, and was elected to represent, Abingdon. At the death of Sir William Follett he was appointed attorney-general; but the Peel ministry vacating office soon afterwards, he retired with his party. Under the Derby administration of 1852, he again became attorney-general, and lord chancellor, as Lord Chelmsford, in 1859 and 1866. b. in London, 1794.

THESPIS, thes'-pis, a Greek poet of Attica, who, according to the ancient tradition, was the inventor of tragedy. He went from town to town in a waggon, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, with faces daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs and speeches. He is said to have written tragedies, which are lost. Flourished about 535 b.c.

THESSALUS, the'-sa-lus, a Greek physician, who resided at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia. He assisted to establish the sect of Dogmatici, called also the Hippocratic school. Some of the writings which are known under the name of Hippocrates, are supposed to have been written by Thessalus. Flourished about 360 b.c.

THESSALUS, a Greek physician, who was one of the founders of the Methodici school of medicine. His vanity was so excessive, that he styled himself "the conqueror of physicians." Galen accused him of being ignorant of the action of drugs. Flourished in the 1st century.

THEUDIS, thu'-dis, king of the Visigoths, who was elected as the successor of Amalaric, in 531. He sustained a war against the Franks, whom, in 542, he drove out of Saragossa; but was repulsed at Ceuta by the Greeks. Although an Arian, he tolerated the orthodox faith. He was the last of the Visigothic kings that resided in Spain. Assassinated at Barcelona, 548.

THEVENOT, Melchisedeck, taivé-no, a learned

French writer, who became Keeper of the Royal Library of France. He produced a collection of voyages and travels, including those of Hakluyt and Purchas, which are highly esteemed; a "History of the Academy of Sciences," of which he was one of the founders, and other works. B. 1621; D. 1692.

THEVENOT, John, a celebrated French traveller, who was nephew of the preceding, travelled in England, Germany, and Italy; and, having made the acquaintance of the celebrated D'Herbelot at Rome, he, at the latter's suggestion, set out upon a journey of exploration in Asia. After visiting Egypt, Persia, and India, he died on his route from Ispahan to Tabriz. He made a collection of the plants of India and Persia, and wrote an account of his travels, which was published after his death, at Amsterdam. He introduced coffee into France. B. at Paris, 1633; D. 1667.

THIBAUT, te'-bo, fifth count of Champagne, and first king of Navarre, succeeded to the crown of Navarre at the death of Sancho the Strong, in 1234, and in 1239 set out upon a crusade in the Holy Land; but after experiencing defeat at Cansarea and at Ascalon, he abandoned his army to its fate, and returned to his kingdom. Sixty-six poems are said to have been written by him; on account of which he takes high rank among the Troubadours. B. 1201; D. at Pampeluna, 1253.

THIBAUT, Anthony Justus Frederick, an eminent German writer upon jurisprudence, who became a judge of the grand-duchy of Baden, and a knight. His writings, which are highly esteemed, principally are, "On the Necessity of a Common Code of Laws for Germany," "Essays on Civil Law," "On Several Branches of the Theory of Law," and "On Possession and Prescription." B. at Hameln, Hanover, 1772; D. 1840.

THIERRY, Amedée-Simon-Dominique, tes'-er-re, a French historian, who became master of requests in the council of state. He assisted his brother Augustin in several of the great works produced by the latter, and himself wrote, "History of Gaul under the Roman Domination," "History of Attila," and "History of the Gauls, from the most remote period until the Conquest of Gaul." B. at Blois, 1797.

THIERRY, Jacques-Nicolas-Augustin, a celebrated French historian, who was at first a teacher in a school; but repairing to Paris in 1814, he, in a few years, attracted attention by his contributions to the liberal journals of that metropolis. In 1820 he was engaged to write a series of letters upon French history for the "Courrier Français;" but his opinions having been attacked, he quitted that journal, and resolved to entirely devote himself to historical inquiry. After four years of assiduous study, he produced his "History of the Conquest of England by the Normans," a work which, despite its peculiar theories, has become celebrated, not alone in France, but also in England and Germany. For a time his eyesight so far failed him that he was reduced to a condition of total blindness; but in that melancholy period he received material assistance from his brother, the above-named, and his wife, Julia Thierry. Consistent in his principles, refusing political employment, he remained a devoted follower of historical research, finding in that course of life something, as he himself expressed it, "better than property—better than health." His other works were, "Ten Years of Historical Study," "Letters on the History of France," "Collections of Documents relative to the History of France," and the "Times of the Merovingians." As an historian, he is excelled by neither Michelet nor Guizot, the greatest historical writers of his country. He was a member of the Legion of Honour, and of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. B. at Blois, 1795; D. 1856.

THIERRY, Julia, a modern French authoress, was the wife of the preceding, and besides assisting him in his historical labours, she herself produced a number of interesting works, the most important of which were, "Pictures of Manners in the 18th and 19th Centuries;" and some excellent essays for the "Revue des Deux Mondes." D. 1844.

THIERS, Jean Baptiste, tes'-air, a learned French divine, who, after being a professor in the university of Paris, obtained the benefice of Champrond, in the diocese of Chartres, where he embroiled himself in disputes with his superiors respecting ecclesiastical dues. He wrote a treatise on "Superstitions respecting the Sacraments," "A History of Purities," and several other curious works. B. at Chartres, about 1636; D. 1703.

THIERS, Louis Adolphe, a celebrated French statesman and historian. It was intended to place him at the Ecole Polytechnique at Paris, in order to qualify him for a military career; but the fall of the empire, and the peace which ensued, leaving only a faint prospect of success to a young military man who possessed no influence, he resolved to adopt the law as a profession, and accordingly entered the college of Aix, where he distinguished himself by his talents for the acquisition of knowledge. He set up in practice as an advocate; but meeting with little success, resolved to apply himself to literature, and, with that view, repaired to Paris. After acquiring some celebrity as a writer of political articles for various French newspapers, he, in 1823, produced the first volume of the "History of the French Revolution." This work, which was not completed until 1830, had but little success at the outset. The revolution of 1830, however, allowed him to take a prominent position. With Armand Carrel, Héranget, and others, he had previously exhibited great energy in denouncing the governmental system of the Bourbons; and when Louis Philippe became the constitutional king of France, Thiers, as one of the chief promoters of the new order of things, was rewarded with a post in the ministry of Finance. He next rose to the highest reputation as a parliamentary orator, and upon the formation of the Soult ministry, in 1833, Thiers became minister of the Interior, an office he exchanged for the ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1836. As a statesman, he evinced a policy antagonistic to England, and somewhat in favour of war. Opposed by Guizot, he was at length supplanted by the latter; whereupon Thiers returned to authorship, and devoted his leisure to the composition of his "History of the Consulate and the Empire." In politics he was regarded as one of the leaders of the opposition to the measures of the king and his minister Guizot, until the Revolution of 1848. At that period he could not succeed in attaining to a prominent position, chiefly distinguishing himself as an orator in the National Assembly, where he denounced some of the pet schemes of the republicans; such, for instance, as rights of labour, the national workshops, and other socialistic theories. As an adherent to the cause of the Orleans family, he was exiled from France at the coup d'état. He took up his residence first at Brussels, and then in London; but subsequently returned to the French capital on declaring his acquiescence with the empire. No statesman of modern times has been more often charged with want of earnestness and of principle. As an historian, his brilliant talents are obscured by his want of truth and candour. "He has unquestionably surpassed all his predecessors," observes an eminent critic, "in the ease and vigour of his style, in his descriptive power, in his delineation of the character of Napoleon, in his view of the organization and inner life of the first empire. . . . His work is the picture of the first empire, and the apotheosis of its chief. The representation, indeed, may not always be accurate, and the panegyric not always just. . . . But we complain of this history, not simply for its mis-statements of facts and its false political reasonings, but also its false morality. We have said that it is the aim of this work to vindicate the first empire. In order to attain this end, the author's facts are strained to meet a distorted morality, and his judgment is often strained to meet a distortion of facts." B. at Marseilles, 1797.

THION DE LA CHAUME, Claude Esprit, tee'-awn (g'-dla-shome), a celebrated French physician, who, in 1782, became chief physician to the troops engaged at the siege of Gibraltar, and there distinguished himself by his arrangements for the cure of the soldiers attacked by fever. He was the author of several valuable papers on medical subjects; but his death, at an early age, cut short a very promising career. B. at Paris, 1750; D. at Montpellier, 1788.

THIRLBY, Styan, thurl'-be, a learned English critic, who was a doctor of laws of the university of Cambridge, and wrote a tract against Whiston on the Trinity; but is principally known by his excellent edition of Justin's works. B. about 1692; D. 1753.

THIRLWALL, Dr. Connop, thurl'-wall, a modern English prelate and historical writer, who at first studied for the legal profession, and was called to the bar; but subsequently entered into holy orders, and became bishop of St. David's. He was the author of a "History of Greece," and also assisted in making a translation of Niebuhr's "History of Rome." B. at Stepney, 1797.

THISTLEWOOD, Arthur, this'-el-wood, memorable as the leader of the "Cato Street" conspirators in 1820, was the son of a respectable farmer near Lincoln, and obtained a Lieutenant's commission in the militia in 1797. He shortly after married a young lady with a considerable fortune, but who died about eighteen months after their union. After squandering his property in dissipation and gambling, he went to London, and from thence made occasional voyages to America and France. He married again, and thereby improved his circumstances; but he had now become a professional gambler, and had associated himself with disaffected characters, which drew on him the notice of government. When the riots in Spa Fields took place, he was arrested as one of the ringleaders; but after being kept some time in confinement, was liberated, there being no proof of his guilt.

Shortly after, he sent a challenge to the home secretary, Lord Sidmouth, and was again committed to prison for a considerable time. Inflamed with resentment, he became the principal actor in the Cato Street conspiracy, the object of which was to murder several members of the administration, while at a cabinet dinner at Lord Harrowby's, and excite an insurrection in the metropolis. Information having been given to the ministers by a spy, a party of police-officers, supported by a company of the guards, proceeded to the place of meeting—a room over some stables in Cato Street—where the conspirators were preparing for their diabolical enterprise. On the entrance of the officers, Thistlewood seized a sword, and killed the foremost of them, named Siffithers, on the spot. He and his coadjutors, however, who were ignorant persons of the lowest class of society, were secured, brought to trial, condemned, and suffered as traitors, May 1, 1820. D. 1772.

THOLUCK, Frederick Augustus Gottren, tol'-uk, a celebrated modern German theologian, who became professor of theology at Halle. His most important works, several of which were translated into English, are, "Translation and Exposition of the Psalms;" "Authenticity of the Evangelical History" (an answer to the "Life of Jesus" by Strauss); "Sermons on the Chief Phases of the Christian Faith and Life;" and "Hours of Devotion." B. at Breslau, 1799.

THOM, James, tom, a Scotch sculptor, who was brought up to the trade of a stonemason; but, having taught himself the art of sculpture, attracted considerable reputation by his carvings, in sandstone, of Tam O'Shanter, Souter Johnnie, and other figures, illustrative of the verses of Burns. In London, the exhibition of his works was at one time very popular; but in time its attractiveness declined, and Thom paid a visit to the United States, where he was so well received, that he resolved to settle there. He subsequently relinquished sculpture, and occupied himself with farming and architecture. His "Tam O'Shanter" and "Souter Johnnie" are placed near the Burns monument on the banks of the Doon. B. in Ayrshire, 1799; D. at New York, 1830.

THOM, William, a Scotch poet, called "the weaver-poet of Inverury." In his tenth year he was apprenticed to the trade of a handloom weaver. In the leisure left from this occupation, he "picked up a little reading and writing;" made an attempt to acquire the Latin language, but was defeated for want of time; and learned to play the German flute. He married, and had a family of four children; but in 1837, in consequence of some commercial failures, he was thrown out of employment, and in order to obtain work had to perform a dreary journey in the cold weather, from his residence at Newtyle, near Cupar Angus, in Forfarshire, to Aberdeen. One of his children died on the journey. His first effort as a song-writer was made at this time. He composed some verses to his flute, and, by offering copies at the houses on his road, obtained the means of proceeding to his destination. He subsequently forwarded some verses to the "Aberdeen Herald," which attracting much attention, his other poems were published. Thom was invited to London, where a dinner was given in his honour; but, after his return to Inverury, he fell into great distress. In 1841 he produced a small volume entitled "Rhymes and Recollections of a Handloom Weaver," which contained verses of great melody and sweetness of sentiment, combined with much taste; but they were far from receiving the success to which their merits entitled them. After his death, subscription amounting to about £250 was raised for his destitute family. b. at Aberdeen, 1799; d. at Inverury, 1850.

THOMAS CATIMPRATENSIS, to'-mas, a French writer, who was a monk, taught theology at Louvain, and was afterwards celebrated as a preacher in France, Germany, and Belgium. He was the author of several lives of the saints, some Latin poems, and a treatise upon morality, entitled "Bonum universale de Apibus." He is also stated by some authors to have made translations of Aristotle. His biographies are included in the "Acta Sanctorum" of the Bollandists. b. 1201; d. 1270.

THOMAS, William, a learned English prelate, who was, in 1677, consecrated bishop of St. David's, whence he was translated to Worcester. He wrote an apology for the Church of England, "Roman Oracles Silenced;" and several sermons. b. at Bristol, 1613; d. 1639.

THOMAS, William, an eminent English divine, and grandson of the preceding. An industrious antiquary, he published an improved edition of Dugdale's "History of Warwickshire," and "A Survey of the Cathedral of Worcester." d. 1738.

THOMAS, Elizabeth, an English poetess, who, having given offence to Pope, was, under the name of Corinna, mentioned in no honourable terms in the "Dunciad." b. 1675; d. 1730.

THOMAS, Antoine Léonard, an eminent French author, who, at an early age, wrote Reflections, historical and literary, on Voltaire's poem of "Natural Religion," in which he defended Christianity with great energy. In 1769 his elogy of Marshal Saxe was crowned by the French Academy. He afterwards celebrated the memories of D'Aguesseau, Duguy-Trouin, Sully, Descartes, and Marcus Aurelius. He also wrote an essay on the Character, Manners, and Minds of Females; an essay upon Eloges, and some poems. b. at Clermont, Auvergne, 1732; d. 1785.

THOMASIN, or TOMASIN, tom-as'-in, an old German poet, who produced a poem upon "Courteous Manners," which is lost; but there exists by him a poem entitled "The Italian Guest," which was in reality a philosophical treatise on the physical and spiritual welfare of man. This poem, which is a masterpiece of early German literature, has never been published entire, but fragments of it are contained in the "History of the Poetical Literature of Germany," by Gervinus. Flourished in the 13th century.

THOMASIVS, James, tho-ma'-si-us, a learned German professor, who was the tutor of Leibnitz, and was distinguished for his philosophical talents. His principal works are, "The Origin of Philosophical and Ecclesiastical History;" and several learned dissertations. b. 1623; d. 1684.

THOMASIVS, Christian, a celebrated German writer, and son of the preceding, published a German literary journal, for some articles in which he was obliged to quit Leipzig and go to Berlin. The king of Prussia made him professor of law in the university of Halle. He introduced the plan of delivering lectures in German, which, before his time, had always been given in the Latin tongue. A man of great learning and sound sense, he was the determined enemy of old prejudices, pedantry, and antiquated superstitions. Frederick the Great said of him, "He denounced trials for witchcraft so loudly, that persons began to be ashamed of them; and from that time the female sex has been permitted to grow old and die in peace." He wrote voluminously upon jurisprudence, morals, and natural law. b. at Leipsic, 1655; d. at Halle, 1728.

THOMPSON, Thomas, tom'-son(g), a French architect, who, at the Revolution, emigrated to Russia, and became a major in the army of that country. He was subsequently extensively employed as an architect, for which profession he was educated. He improved, and in part reconstructed, the great theatre, and erected the Exchange, at St. Petersburg, as also the tomb of the emperor Paul at Paulovska, the theatre at Odessa, &c. b. at Nancy, 1759; d. in Russia, 1813.

THOMPSON, Sir Benjamin, tom'-son. (See BUNFORD, Count.)

THOMPSON, Edward, an English poet, who, in early life, was pressed on board a man-of-war, and rose to the rank of Lieutenant in 1757. At the end of the war he retired on half-pay, and occupied himself with literature. His principal works were "The Soldier," a poem; "The Courtesan;" "Sailor's Letters;" a ludicrous account of the jubilee at Stratford-upon-Avon, under the title of "Trinculo's Trip to the Jubilee;" "The Fair Quaker," a comedy altered from Shadwell; and an edition of the works of Andrew Marvell. b. at Hull, Yorkshire, about 1720; d. on the coast of Africa, 1786.

THOMPSON, William, an eminent Irish naturalist, who was educated for a commercial life. He followed it as an amateur during several years, and at length abandoned business for natural science. In 1841 he was permitted to accompany Professor Edward Forbes upon a voyage of observation in the Aegean Sea, in H.M.S. Beacon. He became a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and was elected president of the Natural History and Philosophical Society of Belfast. His most important contributions to science were, "On Some Rare Irish Birds;" "On the Natural History of Ireland, with a Description of a New Genus of Fishes;" "Report on the Fauna of Ireland, division Vertebrata;" and numerous papers inserted in the "Annals of Natural History." The "Bibliography" of the Ray Society enumerates more than seventy papers upon subjects on natural history by him. b. at Belfast, 1806; d. in London, 1852.

THOMPSON, Lieut.-General Thomas Perronet, modern English politician and author, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where, in 1802, he took his B.A. degree. After serving for a time in the royal navy, he entered upon a military career, was at the attack upon Buenos Ayres in 1807, and subsequently participated in the battles of Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse. In 1819 he was appointed secretary and Arabic interpreter to sir William Grant Keir, the commander of the expedition dispatched to the Persian Gulf. Subsequently to his return to England in 1821, he was associated with Jeremy Bentham and Dr. (afterwards Sir John) Bowring, in the proprietorship of the "Westminster Review." In 1827 he produced his "Corn-Law Catechism," which may be said to have formed the basis of the Anti-Corn Law League which afterwards sprang into existence. Free trade and Parliamentary reform were subjects to which his pen was constantly devoted, and in the advocacy of which he wrote articles for the "Westminster Review," pamphlets, and letters to the newspapers. He was also the assiduous supporter of a liberal policy as a speaker in the House of Commons and at public meetings. In 1854 he was promoted to the grade of major-general. He was the author, among other works, of—"Catechism on the Currency," an "Enharmonic Theory of Music," and "Geometry without Axioms." A collected edition of his works, political and others, was published in 6 vols. in 1843. a. at Hull, Yorkshire, 1783; d. 1869.

THOMSON, Rev. R. Anchor, a modern English divine and writer upon theology, received his education at the university of Cambridge, and became master of the Hospital of St. Mary the Virgin, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. His principal works were, "Christian Theism," and "Principles of Natural Theology." a. at Durham, 1821.

THOMS, William John, toms, a modern English antiquarian writer, who, early in life, was appointed to a clerkship in the secretary's office at Chelsea Hospital, and subsequently became clerk in the Printed Papers department of the House of Lords. His first efforts in literature consisted of contributions to the "Foreign Quarterly Review." In 1828 he produced a collection of "Early Prose Romances," and, subsequently, "Lays and Legends of Various Nations," "Anecdotes and Traditions," an edition of Stow's "Survey of London," and a translation of Worsaae's "Primeval Antiquities of Denmark." He was secretary of the Camden Society, and in 1849 started "Notes and Queries," a work containing a profusion of valuable articles. b. in London, 1803.

THOMSON, James, tom'-son, an eminent Scotch poet. The son of a clergyman, he was educated at Jedburgh, and afterwards at Edinburgh, with a view to the ministry in the Church of Scotland, which profession he declined. Having written his poem of "Winter," he repaired to London, where, according to Dr. Johnson, he wandered about "with the gaping curiosity of a new comer; his attention upon everything rather than upon his pocket." In consequence, he lost his handkerchief and letters of recommendation. After experiencing many of the sharp stings of poverty, he obtained a publisher for his "Winter," which, however, lay unnoticed for a considerable time. Afterwards, its great merit becoming appreciated, Thomson was brought into notice and popularity. He next produced his "Summer," "Spring," and "Autumn," and a "Poem sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton." Thomson accompanied the Hon. Mr. Talbot, son of the lord chancellor, on his travels; and, on his return, settled at Richmond, in narrow circumstances. He produced some dramatic pieces of considerable merit; "Liberty," a poem; and the "Castle of Indolence," in the manner of Spenser. But his fame rests upon the poems of "The Seasons," to which even Dr. Johnson has borne the testimony of approbation. In descriptive scenery and pathetic expression, few poets will be found to excel Thomson. "Amidst much that is truly exquisite," says an eminent authority, "both in feeling and expression, he mingles the absurdities of a schoolboy's trite commonplaces and mechanical contrivances to piece out his verse;" but, "in spite of these drawbacks, he is a charming poet, and one whose works have always been the delight of all classes." About two years before his death he obtained the place of surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands; an office he paid a deputy to fulfil, but which, nevertheless, yielded the poet about £300 per annum. b. at Ednam, Roxburghshire, 1700; d. 1749; d. 1869.

THOMSON, Alexander, a poet and miscellaneous writer; author of "The British Parnassus at the Close of the Eighteenth Century," a poem in four cantos; "The Paradise of Taste," a poem; "Pictures of Poetry, Historical, Biographical, and Critical," &c. b. 1762; d. 1803.

THOMSON, Dr. Andrew, a distinguished divine and leader in the national church courts of Scotland, was ordained minister of the parish of Sprouston, in 1802; removed to the East Church of Perth, in 1808, where he laboured till 1810, when he received a presentation to the New Grey Friars' church, Edinburgh; and in 1814 was appointed to St. George's church, where he was especially distinguished and rapidly extended his reputation, and acquired great influence. He especially distinguished himself by his efforts in connexion with the Bible Society, and for the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies. b. at Sanguhar, Dumfriesshire, 1779; d. 1831.

THOMSON, Rev. John, a distinguished landscape painter, succeeded his father as minister of Dailly, Ayrshire, in 1800, and was translated to Duddingstone, near Edinburgh, in 1805, where he remained till his death. From his boyhood he evinced a strong predilection for art, which increased with time; and having early become an honorary member of the Royal Scottish Academy, he produced a variety of landscapes, which placed him on a level with the best artists of his country and age. b. 1778; d. 1840.

THOMSON, Anthony Todd, a modern Scotch physician and writer upon medicine, studied at Edinburgh, where he made the acquaintance of Brougham, Lansdowne, Jeffrey, and others, with whom he was associated as a member of the celebrated Speculative Society. In 1800 he established himself in practice in London, and, in the leisure left from his professional pursuits, composed a number of works of great value. The most important of these works were, "Conspectus Pharmacopœia," "London Dispensatory," "Lectures on Botany," and some articles in the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine." In 1823 he became professor of materia medica, and in 1832 of medical jurisprudence, in the London University, now University College. b. at Edinburgh, 1778; d. at Ealing, 1849.

THOMSON, Mrs. Anthony Todd, a modern English authoress, who was the wife of the preceding. She produced Memoirs of the Court of Henry VIII.; of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough; of Viscountess Sandon, mistress of the robes to the consort of George II.; "Recollections of Literary Characters and Celebrated Places," which originally appeared in the pages of "Bentley's Miscellany" and "Fraser's Magazine," under the signature of "Middle-aged Man;" a title which she took in order, as she says, "by better disguising myself, I might, at that time, express myself the more unreservedly." She was likewise the authoress of some novels and romances, which display considerable talent both in description and observation. B. 1800; D. 1862.

THOMSON, Thomas, a celebrated Scotch chemist, who studied under Dr. Black, at Edinburgh. He commenced as a lecturer upon chemistry in 1802, and continued to perform the same functions during the fifty subsequent years. For the "Encyclopædia Britannica" he wrote articles upon chemistry, mineralogy, &c., and also acted as one of the editors of that work. The employment of symbols in chemistry was first suggested by him, and he also distinguished himself by his elucidations of the atomic theory of Dalton. His most important works were, "System of Chemistry," "Outlines of Mineralogy, Geology, and Mineral Analysis," and "Brewing and Distillation." He was the projector of the "Annals of Philosophy," a scientific journal, which he edited for several years. In 1818 he was elected professor of chemistry in the university of Glasgow. B. at Crieff, Perthshire, 1773; D. at Glasgow, 1852. —His son, Dr. Thomas Thomson, became superintendent of the East India Company's botanic gardens at Calcutta.

THORNBURN, Robert, A.R.A., thor'-burn, a famous modern miniature-painter, studied his art in the Scottish Academy at Edinburgh, and in 1836 repaired to London, where he soon became the favourite miniature-painter with the court and aristocracy. His productions were for many years among the chief attractions of the exhibition at the Royal Academy. B. at Dumfries, Scotland, 1818.

THORND, thor'-do, a celebrated Danish jurist, who made a collection of the civil and constitutional laws of Denmark, from the earliest times to 1377. The work is valuable as affording materials for the social and political history of Denmark. An edition of it was published at Copenhagen in 1808. Thornd was chief judge of the province of Jutland, and flourished in the 14th century.

THORNDSEN, Sturla, thor'-son, a Danish statesman and historian, who was the nephew of the celebrated Snorro Sturleson, whose history of Denmark, Iceland, and Norway he continued. He held the very highest office under the Danish kings Hacon and Magnus. Only a fragment of his history is extant; but an abstract of it is given in the "Historia Rerum Norvegiarum" of Torfaeus. Thordsen was B. 1218; D. 1288.

THORNTON, Ralph, thor'-te, an eminent English topographer and antiquary, who was a fellow of the Royal Society, and wrote the "Topography of Leeds." He also formed a museum at Leeds, which was very rich in the departments of manuscripts and coins. B. at Leeds, 1658; D. 1725.

THORNTON, Thomas, thor'-ild, a Swedish poet, who visited England, and, while there, wrote two pamphlets in English. He was at first a great admirer of England, where, he said, "almost everything of its kind is the best I have seen—the beer, the theatre, the letters, the sermons." He subsequently, however, suffered a material change of opinion. His works, consisting of poems, literary criticisms, and essays, were published at Stockholm in 1824. B. 1759; D. 1808.

THORNTON, George Walter, thor'-bur-e, a modern English littérateur, began his career as a contributor to a newspaper in Bristol, and in 1851 published his "Lays and Legends of the New World," which was followed by a series of papers on the courts of the Crystal Palace; by a "History of the Buccaneers," "Shakspeare's England," "Songs of the Cavaliers and Roundheads," "Life in Spain and in Turkey," "Life of J. M. W. Turner," &c. He was also a prolific contributor to some of the leading magazines and other periodicals. B. 1828.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, thor'-dike, a learned English divine, who, in 1643, became master of Sidney College, of which he was soon afterwards deprived for his adherence to the cause of Charles I. At the Restoration he obtained a prebend in Westminster Abbey. He wrote a folio volume, entitled "Epilogus," in which he defended the Church of England with great learning and ability. He was also the author of a "Treatise on Weights and Measures;" another on "Church Censures;" and assisted Walton in his edition of the Polyglot Bible. D. 1673.

THORNECROFT, Mrs. Mary, thor'-ne-croft, a modern English sculptor, who was the daughter of Mr. John Francis, the sculptor, by whom she was taught modelling in her youth. So great was her progress, that in her twentieth year she attracted notice as a talented artist—her "Penelope," and "Ulysses and his Dog," exhibited at the Royal Academy, being much admired. In 1848 she married, and proceeded to Italy. She modelled "Sappho and the Sleeping Child," and, upon the recommendation of Gibson, was selected to execute busts and statues of the royal children. In that commission she acquitted herself so well as to become a favourite sculptor with the court. For her Majesty, Mrs. Thorneycroft modelled a statue of the Princess Beatrice floating in the shell of a nautilus, which is admitted to be a work of great beauty. B. in Norfolk, 1814.

THORNHILL, Sir James, an English painter, whose uncle, the famous Dr. Sydenham, enabled him to pursue his inclination for painting, in which art he greatly improved himself abroad. The dome of St. Paul's, the Hospital at Greenwich, and Hampton Court Palace, exhibit specimens of his talents as a painter. According to Horace Walpole, he received only forty shillings a square yard for his paintings on the cupola of St. Paul's. He was appointed principal painter to Queen Anne, and George I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He acquired considerable wealth by his profession, and became a member of the House of Commons. Hogarth married his daughter. B. at Weymouth, 1676; D. 1734.

THORNTON, Bonnel, thor'-ton, an English poet and miscellaneous writer. In 1734 he engaged with George Colman and others in a periodical work entitled "The Student," and afterwards in another called "The Connoisseur." In 1766 he published, with Colman and Richard Warner, a translation of "Plautus," and the year following, a burlesque poem upon the physicians, called "The Battle of the Nigs." B. in London, 1724; D. 1768.

death of his brother, resolved to pursue medicine as a profession, and became a member of Guy's Hospital. After studying three years in London, he visited the Continent; and, returning to the metropolis, commenced practice. In 1798 he published a work entitled "The Philosophy of Medicine, or Medical Extracts on the Nature of Health and Disease;" and soon after brought out another work, called "The Philosophy of Politics," &c. His chief fame, however, is derived from his magnificent "Temple of Flora, or Garden of the Botanist, Poet, Painter, and Philosopher." B. 1758; D. 1837.

THORWALDSEN, Bertel, or Albert, thor-wauld-sen, a celebrated Danish sculptor, who was the son of a carver in wood in humble circumstances. Until his eleventh year he worked at the same business; but being sent, about this time, to the school of the Academy of Arts at Copenhagen, he made such progress, that, in two years, he became a better carver than his father, and began to be employed upon the figure-heads of ships. At seventeen he gained a silver medal for a bas-relief of Cupid reposing, and in his twenty-second year won the gold medal of the Fine Arts Academy, to which was added a travelling studentship for three years, his expenses to be defrayed by the government. In 1798 he set out for Italy on board a Danish frigate, and in the following year landed at Palermo. After a short stay at Naples, he proceeded to Rome, where he studied and worked under the auspices of his countryman, Zoëga. An accident prevented his returning home at the expiration of his term, and, having found patrons at Rome, he resolved to settle there. He modelled a statue of Jason, which Canova spoke of as being in "a new and grand style," an opinion which was repeated to Mr. Thomas Hope, who, accordingly, visited the young sculptor's studio, and gave him a commission for a marble copy of the work. This was the first success of Thorwaldsen, who thenceforth rose rapidly into reputation. His bas-reliefs of Summer and Autumn, the "Dance of the Muses on Helicon," "Venus with the Apple," "Cupid and Psyche," the "Triumph of Alexander," for the Quirinal Palace, and other works, brought him fame, and were the principal efforts of his genius during his first sojourn of twenty-one years at Rome. In 1819 he returned to Copenhagen, where he was received with enthusiasm; but in a year he again set out for Italy, passing through Germany on his route. His "St. John in the Wilderness," and the monumental groups to Pius VII., Poniatowski, Maximilian of Bavaria, and Copernicus, were among his greatest productions executed during his second residence in Rome. In 1833 his native government sent a frigate to convey him and his sculptures to Copenhagen, where he remained until 1841, in which year the delicate state of his health caused him to return to Italy. In 1842 he returned to Denmark once more, and continued to reside there until his death. In addition to the works already mentioned, a few others may be cited as those upon which his fame rests: these are,—the busts of the poets Holberg and Oehlenschläger, and the statue of Lord Byron; which latter was intended to be placed in Westminster Abbey; but the necessary permission of the dean being withheld, it remained in the Custom House during twelve years, until at length it found a place in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. Thorwaldsen bequeathed almost the whole of his personal estate for the founding of a museum, which was to contain all his works, either originals or in casts, and to bear his name. This museum is one of the finest buildings in Copenhagen, and forms one of the chief attractions of the city. The Crystal Palace at Sydenham contains several casts from his works. D. at Copenhagen, 1770; D. 1844.

THOU, Jacques Auguste de, too, or, as he styled himself in Latin, "Thuanus," a celebrated French historian, was the son of Christopher de Thou, first president of the Parliament of Paris. He was designed for the ecclesiastical state, and his uncle, the Bishop of Chartres, resigned some of his benefices in his favour; but he subsequently relinquished this intention, and became a counsellor to the Parliament, and one of its presidents. Henry III. employed him on an embassy first to Vienna and next to Venice; and Henry IV. admitted him into his councils, and engaged him in several important negotiations. His greatest work was the "History of his Own Time from 1545 to 1607," which is written in pure Latin, and with great fidelity. The best edition is that of London, 1733. His Latin poems were printed in 1611. B. at Paris, 1553; D. 1617.—His son, François Auguste de Thou, was librarian to the king; but having been charged with participation in the conspiracy of Cinq-Mars, he was beheaded at Lyons in 1642.

THOUARS, Louis Marie Aubert du Petit, too'-ar, an eminent French botanist, who came of a rich and noble family, and, at an early age, entered upon a military career; but his love of science and adventure led him to fit out a vessel in which he and his brother intended to go in search of La Perouse, the French navigator. On his way from Paris to Brest, where his ship lay, he was arrested by the revolutionists as an enemy to France, and thrown into prison at Quimper. In a short time he obtained his release; but his brother having sailed in the interim, he proceeded in search of him to the Isle of France, whence his brother had sailed before his arrival. Aubert remained in the island during ten years, amassing a large body of materials for the scientific works which he published after his return to France in 1802. Four years later he received the appointment of director of the royal nursery-ground at the French capital. His most important works were, "History of the Vegetation of the Islands of France, Bourbon, and Madagascar;" "Essay on the Organization of Plants;" and "Miscellanies of Botany and Travel." B. in Anjou, 1756; D. at Paris, 1831.

THOUVER, Michael Augustin, too'-rai, a distinguished French physician, who became dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Paris. He proposed a successful plan for the removal of the cemetery of the Holy Innocents at Paris, which, having long been used as the chief burial-ground of the French capital, had become a source of great unhealthiness. He wrote some valuable papers on medicine. D. 1748; D. 1810.

TROUVENEZ, Edouard Antoine, too'-vai-nel, a French diplomatist and statesman, was bred to the legal profession, and after finishing his studies travelled for some time in the East, and on his return to France published his "Impressions de Voyage" in some papers on Hungary and Wallachia which appeared in the "Revue des Deux Mondes." These papers first brought him into notice, and determined his future career as a diplomatist. In 1844 he became attached to the French Legation at Brussels, and shortly afterwards was chosen to go on a mission to Athens, where he remained several years. After the Revolution of February, 1848, he was sent as minister to Munich; and after the coup d'état of 1851, filled the position of political director of the ministry of foreign affairs. In 1855 he was sent as ambassador to Constantinople, was made a senator in 1859, and in 1861 became minister for foreign affairs, which he held for rather more than a year, when he was succeeded by M. Drouyn de Lhuys. B. 1818; D. 1866.

THRASEA PAETUS, Lucius or Publius, thra'-se-a pe'-tus, a Roman senator, and member of the priestly college, who was the only one in the senate courageous enough to avow his detestation of the murder of Agrippina by her son, the emperor Nero. This, and the popularity of Thrasea with the most honourable men among his contemporaries, caused him to incur the hatred of Nero, who, to get rid of him, incited Cossutianus, the enemy of Thrasea, to charge him with being an enemy to the state and to the emperor. The degraded senate decreed that he should die, but allowed him to choose his mode of death. The decree was conveyed to Thrasea at his villa, and the senator caused the veins of both his arms to be opened. He was the author of a "Biography of Cato the Younger," which is lost, but is said to have been used by Plutarch in his "Lives." D. 66.

THRASYBULUS, thra'-s-bu'-lus, a celebrated Athenian general, who in the time of the Thirty Tyrants took refuge at Thebes. Having gained some followers, he marched against the usurpers and expelled them. In commemoration of this triumph, a yearly festival was instituted at Athens. Thrasybulus wisely procured the passing of a general amnesty, which decreed that no one but the principals should be punished for the atrocities which had been committed. He subsequently displayed great valour in Thrace, and slew the Lacedæmonian general with his own hand. Thrasybulus was surprised and assassinated in his tent by the people of Aspendas, a town of Pamphylia, 389 B.C.

THROCKMORTON, Sir Nicholas, throk'-mor ..., an English statesman, who, in early life, became page to the duke of Richmond, natural son of Henry VIII. He subsequently served under the Protector Somerset in the Scottish campaign, and was selected, in 1547, to convey to London the news of the victory gained over the Scotch at Musselburgh. He was in favour under Edward VI., who appointed him under-treasurer of the Mint, and bestowed upon him some valuable estates. After the death of Edward VI., he was charged with being implicated in the conspiracy of Sir William Wyatt, and imprisoned in the Tower; but, on being brought to trial, he so ably defended himself, as to gain an acquittal from the jury, despite the threats of the chief justice. He then retired to France, in order to avoid the persecutions to which, as a Protestant, he might be subjected under the reign of Mary. Queen Elizabeth, upon her accession, appointed Throckmorton chief butler of England and chamberlain of the exchequer; but in 1569 he was arrested on the charge of being concerned in negotiating a marriage between Mary Queen of Scots, and the duke of Norfolk, and, after a short confinement in the Tower, was released, but lost his places under the crown. His death occurred shortly afterwards. B. about 1513; D. 1571.

THUCYDIDES, thu-sid'-i-dees, a celebrated Greek historian, who was of noble birth, and, on arriving at maturity, took part in the Peloponnesian war; but falling in an expedition with which he had been intrusted, he was banished, and in his exile collected materials for his "History of the Peloponnesian War," which he produced after his return from banishment. The best edition of Thucydides is that of Bekker, Berlin, 1821. B. 471 B.C.; D. uncertain when.

THULDEN, Theodore van, tool'-den, an eminent Dutch painter, who was the pupil and favourite of Rubens, and painted a great number of the works in the gallery of the Luxembourg. His manner so closely resembled that of his master, that a painting of his, "The Martyrdom of St. Andrew," contained in St. Michael's church at Ghent, was long thought to be the work of Rubens. His best works are the "St. Sebastian," in the church of the Bernardines at Mechlin; an "Assumption of the Virgin," in the Jesuits' church at Bruges; and a series illustrative of the life of St. John of Matha, in the ecclesiastical edifice belonging to the Mathurins, at Paris. He also excelled as an etcher, and reproduced forty-two designs by Rubens, commemorating the entrance of the Cardinal-infante Ferdinand into Antwerp. B. at Bois-le-Duc, 1607; D. at the same place, 1676.

TÜMMEL, Moritz August von, term'-el, a German writer, who was, for a period, privy councillor and minister to Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg. He was the author of "Wilhelmine," a comic poem in prose; and "Travels in the Southern Provinces of France," which was highly praised by Schiller. It very much resembles the "Sentimental Journey" of Sterne, and is interspersed with several charming pieces of verse and some pleasing narratives. His complete works were issued in six volumes. B. at Schönfeld, near Leipzig, 1738; D. at Coburg, 1817.

TURNER, Charles Peter, thoon'-bery, a celebrated Swedish botanist and traveller, who was the disciple of Linnæus. The Dutch East India Company sent him to their settlements in Japan, where he made great collections. After this he went to Ceylon, and on his return to Europe became professor of botany at Upsal. His principal works were, an account of his travels, a work upon the Botany of the Cape of Good Hope, and "Flora Japonica." B. at Jönköping, Sweden, 1743; D. 1823.

TURNER, John, thun'-lo, an English political writer, who was educated for the legal profession, and became confidential secretary to Cromwell, afterwards holding the same appointment under his son Richard. After the Restoration he was committed by the House of Commons to the custody of their serjeant-at-arms on a charge of treason, but was soon released. His invaluable state papers have been printed in seven volumes. B. in Essex, 1616; D. in London, 1668.

TURNER, Edward, Lord, an eminent English lawyer, who was in 1754 called to the bar, and in the course of a few years rose to a high reputation in his profession. After being appointed king's counsel, he entered Parliament, and was here distinguished as a strenuous supporter of Lord North's administration, particularly with respect to the policy pursued towards the Americans. This conduct caused him to gain the favour of George III., who during twenty years evinced considerable personal regard for him. He was appointed solicitor-general in 1770, attorney-general in the following year, and in 1778 became lord chancellor, being at the same time created Baron Thurlow. He held the great seal during the four subsequent years, which formed the term of the North ministry, and was, according to the king's desire, allowed to retain it in the Rockingham administration, which supplanted that of Thurlow's former colleagues. His opposition to the new cabinet was, however, so energetic and so clearly avowed, that his continuance in office was stoutly opposed by Mr. Fox. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham, Fox assisted Lord North to form a coalition ministry, and Thurlow, although the king desired that he might continue to keep possession of the great seal, was compelled to resign it. He, nevertheless, exercised a large share of influence in the national councils, as a member of that coterie termed by Junius "the king's friends." When Pitt became minister, in 1783, Lord Thurlow was again appointed lord chancellor, and retained the office during the nine succeeding years. At length, however, he, as formerly under the Rockingham ministry, began actually to oppose measures which Pitt had introduced into Parliament. Pitt informed the king that either himself or Lord Thurlow must retire; whereupon his majesty intimated to Thurlow that the great seal must pass into other hands. Thurlow, who had relied upon the king's friendship, was astonished at this communication, and was even bold enough to declare that "no man had a right to treat another as the king had treated him." He retired in 1792. Subsequently, on a few occasions, he voted against his former colleagues, and is understood to have been consulted on legal business by the royal family; but from this period until his death he exerted little influence on public affairs. An interesting account of an interview between himself and Sir Samuel Romilly, respecting the charges brought by Lady Douglas against the Princess of Wales, is to be found in the 2nd volume of "Romilly's Memoirs," p. near Stowmarket, Suffolk, 1732; p. at Brighton, 1806. (See Lord Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors.")

THURROT, François, too'-ro, a French naval officer, who, having rendered himself conspicuous by his courage and success while in command of a privateer, was invited to enter the royal navy, and intrusted with the command of five frigates and a corvette, destined to make a descent on the British coasts. He sailed on this expedition, Oct. 15, 1759, and arriving at Carrickfergus Bay, in Ireland, Jan. 10, 1760, the troops were landed, and the place surrendered in a few days. Thurrot, however, soon re-embarked his troops; and, on his return to France, his vessels were attacked by an English squadron, and he was killed in the engagement, Jan. 20, 1760. p. 1727.

THARRI, Alexander, ti'-a-re-ne, a celebrated Italian painter, who was one of the great masters of the Bolognese school. He painted portraits and historical subjects in a fine style. b. at Bologna, 1577; d. 1668.

TIBERIUS, Claudius Nero, ti-be'-ri-us, a Roman emperor, who was descended from the family of the Claudii, and succeeded Augustus 14 A.D. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the people with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators. After distinguishing himself as a general in various parts, he was rewarded with four successive triumphs. At the height of his fame he suddenly retired to the island of Rhodes, where he remained during eight years. Returning to Rome, 2 A.D., he was invested with the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus; at whose death, Tiberius, who was the step-son of Augustus, and had been adopted, assumed the reins of government. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the empire. Tiberius, however, soon appeared in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany; but the tumults were appeased by the prudence of the generals. He beheld the triumphs of Germanicus with jealousy, indeed dreaded the power of his general, whose death at Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent, were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was in Rome scarcely a single family that did not reproach Tiberius with the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at length retired to the island of Capree, on the coast of Campania, where he gave himself up to infamous pleasures. The care of the empire was intrusted to his favourite Sejanus. Tiberius, on being made acquainted with the tyrannical measures of Sejanus, ordered him to be put to death. (See SEJANUS.) Shortly afterwards he fell into a lethargy, which was mistaken for death, and Caligula, his favourite and the son of Germanicus, was proclaimed emperor. Tiberius, however, recovered; but Macro, the commander of the Prætorian guard, caused him to be suffocated. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. He was a patron of literature and the arts, and was the author of some Greek poems. b. at Rome, 42 B.C.; d. near Misenum, 37 A.D.

TIBERIUS, Constantine, emperor of the East, was a Thracian, and was brought up at the court of Justinian. Justin II., the successor of the latter, took Tiberius into his favour, elevated him to the first offices in the state, and in 574 appointed him his colleague in the empire. On the death of Justin, in 578, Tiberius became sole emperor. His armies defeated the Persians, and he reigned with great wisdom and moderation. p. 582.

TIBERIUS ABRIMARUS, emperor of the East, dethroned Leontius by the aid of the patrician John, and defeated the Mohammedan inhabitants of Syria; but Justinian II., who had been deposed by Leontius, having suddenly appeared before Constantinople, took the city. Tiberius attempted to escape, but was taken and beheaded by Justinian, 705.

TIBERIUS ALEXANDER, prefect of Egypt, was a Jew, and had adopted heathenism. In quelling an insurrection of the Jews at Alexandria, he is stated to have put to death upwards of 50,000 of them. He was a favourite with the emperor Vespasian and his successor Titus which latter he accompanied to the siege of Jerusalem. Flourished in the 1st century.

TIBERIUS OF ALEXANDRIA was a Greek grammarian, who composed a number of rhetorical treatises, only one of which is extant. It is published in the "Rhetores Selecti" of Gale. Flourished in the 4th century.

TIBULLUS, Albius, ti-bul'-lus, a Roman poet, who was of the equestrian order, and was at one time possessed of large property, a great part of which he appears to have lost under the reign of Augustus. He led a quiet country life until about 27 B.C., when he accompanied his patron, Valerius Messalla, to Aquitania. Four books of his "Elegies" remain, which are distinguished for their elegance. They are usually published with Catullus and Propertius. His poems have been translated into English by Dart. B. about 57 B.C.; D. about the commencement of the 1st century.

TICKELL, Thomas, tick'-ell, an English poet and miscellaneous writer, who became fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. He translated the first book of the "Iliad," the earliest portion of which Addison preferred to that of Pope. He also wrote some papers in the "Spectator," and acted as private secretary to Addison when he was secretary of state. Tickell subsequently became secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, an office he retained until his death. He wrote a beautiful poem on the death of Addison, and published a collection of his works. B. at Bridgwater, Cumberland, 1686; D. 1740.

TICKELL, Richard, an English poet and political writer. He published "The Project," and the "Wreath of Fashion," poems which had some popularity in their day. But his principal effort was a pamphlet, called "Anticipation," in which, in 1779, he imitated the manner and style of the leading members of the House of Commons. He also adapted the "Gentle Shepherd" to the stage, and wrote the "Carnival of Venice," a comic opera. D. 1793.

TICKNOR, George, tick'-nor, an eminent American writer and philologist, who, after completing his education at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, devoted himself to the study of the law, which, however, he subsequently relinquished to follow a literary career. In order to perfect himself in the modern languages, he spent some years in the cities of Paris, Rome, Madrid, Lisbon, London, and Edinburgh. At the last-mentioned place he made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, who, in a letter to Southey, spoke of him as a "wondrous fellow for romantic lore and antiquarian research, considering his country." In 1819 he returned to his native country, and accepted the professorship of modern languages at Harvard University, the duties of which office he fulfilled during fifteen years. Although his lectures upon European literature were greatly admired, he published nothing until 1819, having, in the meanwhile, paid a second visit to Europe. At the last-named date he produced his "History of Spanish Literature; with Criticisms on the particular Works, and Biographical Notices of Prominent Writers." This work is admitted on all hands to be the best of the kind extant. It has been reproduced in Spain and Germany. B. at Boston, Mass., 1791.

Tieck

TICOZZI, Stefano, te-kot'-ze, an industrious Italian writer, who held an official appointment under Napoleon's administration of Italy; but, after the fall of the French emperor, he was dismissed from his place, and thenceforth supported himself at Milan, by literary labour. His principal productions were, "A Dictionary of Painting," "Historical Tales from the Middle-Age History of Italy," a continuation of Verri's "History of Milan," and a translation of Sismondi's "History of the Italian Republics." B. in the province of Como, 1762; D. 1836.

TIDEMAN, Philip, tee'-dai-man, a German painter, who was the disciple of Lairese, and painted subjects from fabulous history and allegory. B. 1657; D. 1715.

TIECK, Christian Frederick, teek, an eminent German sculptor, who studied under Schadow, and subsequently under David, at Paris. In 1801 he repaired to Weimar, where he became the intimate friend of Göthe, and was engaged upon the sculptural decorations of the new palace. He accompanied his brother Ludwig to Italy in 1805, and, while there, was commissioned by Madame de Stael and Ludwig, crown prince of Bavaria, to execute several busts. In 1819 he established himself at Berlin, became a member of the Academy there, and was engaged to execute many of the most important public works in that city. His most celebrated productions were, a bust of Kiss, the sculptor of the "Amazon," of Lessing, Erasmus, and Wallenstein, for the Walhalla, and the sculptural decorations of the Theatre Royal and the cathedral of Berlin. Several casts from his works are to be found in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. B. at Berlin, 1776; D. there, 1851.

TIECK, Ludwig, a celebrated German writer, and elder brother of the preceding, distinguished himself in early life at the universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Erlangen, and, in his 19th year, made his first effort in literature, by producing "Almansur," a prose idyll. Some plays succeeded, and in 1793 a paraphrase of Ben Jonson's "Volpone." Tales, novels, tragedies and comedies, a translation of "Don Quixote," a collection of "Volksmärchen," (popular legends), and reproductions in German of Ben Jonson's "Epicene, or the Silent Woman," and the "Tempest" of Shakspeare, occupied his pen up to the year 1802. "Love Songs," some tales contributed to Schlegel's "Musen-Almanach," and several translations from Old English dramas, mainly occupied him until 1817, when he visited England, for the purpose of studying the literature of the Elizabethan period. Subsequently to his return, he produced translations of Green's "Friar Bacon," Heywood's "Lancashire Witches," and other works of the period preceding Shakspeare. He was next employed in assisting Schlegel to produce a translation of the acknowledged plays of Shakspeare,—an undertaking which was terminated in 1829, and became the standard text of the great English dramatist in Germany. Meanwhile he had written a picturesque narrative of the insurrection in the Camovnes, and a poem upon the death of Camocnus. Several novels followed, and in 1810 he was invited to Berlin by Frederick William IV., and made a privy councillor. His latest employments were in editing the works of Novalis, the posthumous writings of Kleist and of Linz, and in producing a revised and collected edition of his own works. This edition was published at Berlin, in twenty volumes, between the years 1828 and 1846. "He died," says an eminent authority, "leaving a name which may rank with the highest in his native country, and which most Englishmen may reverence as that which in Germany is most connected with popularizing the fame of the great dramatic poet of England." n. at Berlin, 1773; n. there, 1853.

TIEDEMANN, Dietrich, tee'-dai-man, a learned German writer, who completed his education at the university of Göttingen, where he was greatly esteemed by Professor Heyne. Upon the recommendation of that learned man, he obtained in 1766 the appointment of professor of the Latin and Greek languages at Cassel, whence he removed, in 1768, to Marburg, where he became professor of philosophy. His principal works were, "Essay on an Explanation of the Origin of Language;" "System of the Stoic Philosophy;" "The First Philosophers of Greece;" "Spirit of Speculative Philosophy;" and "Argumenta Platonis." n. near Bremen, 1748; n. 1803.

TIEDERMANN, Frederick, an eminent German anatomist, who, in 1806, became professor of physiology and anatomy at Landshut. He was the author of "Zoology;" "Anatomy of the Heart of Fishes;" "Anatomy of the Flying Lizard or Dragon;" "Anatomy of Headless Monsters;" "Arteries of the Human Body;" "Plates of the Brain of Monkeys;" and the "Physiology of Man." In 1849 his eldest son, who had held the command of the castle of Rastadt, was executed for having taken part with the revolutionists. This event so deeply affected him, that he was compelled to relinquish the professorship of comparative anatomy and zoology, which he had held with great distinction from the year 1816. n. at Cassel, 1781.

TIEDGE, Christoph August, teej(r), a celebrated German poet, and styled the "Nestor of German poetry," whose works consist of elegies, poetical epistles, &c., all of which evince a deeply religious character. In his honour the "Tiedge Institution" was founded at Dresden. n. at Gardelegen, in Altmark, 1752; n. 1841.

TIERNEX, George, teer'-ne, a distinguished English statesman and political writer, received his education at Cambridge, studied law, and was called to the bar. At the commencement of his public life, Mr. Tierney attached himself to the Whigs, and in 1796 was chosen M.P. for Southwark. He soon proved himself an able debater, and was one of the most formidable opponents of Pitt. During a debate in the year 1798, some words spoken in the House were the cause of a duel between him and that statesman, which, however, did not lead to any mischief to either party. When Mr. Addington became minister, in 1802, he made Mr. Tierney treasurer of the navy. In 1806, under the Grenville administration, he became president of the Board of Control, but went out of office along with his colleagues early in the following year. He lost his seat for Southwark in 1806, and subsequently successively sat for Athlone, Bandonbridge, Appleby, and Knaresborough. On the formation of Canning's administration, he was appointed to the mastership of the Mint; from which he retired, with Lord Gode- rich, in 1828. n. 1761; n. 1830.

TIGRANES, ti-grat'-nees, king of Armenia, who became the ally of Mithridates the Great whose daughter Cleopatra he married, and whom he assisted in maintaining a war against the Romans, but was defeated by Lucullus and Pompey. By a bribe of 60,000 talents, he was allowed to keep possession of his throne. Flourished in the 1st century B.C.

TIGRANES, prince of Armenia, and son of the preceding, against whom he revolted, but was defeated. The Romans, however, made him king of Sophene. He was afterwards sent in chains to Rome by Pompey.

TILLEMONT, Sebastian Lenain de, teel'-mawnt(g), a celebrated French historian and critic, who was educated in the school at Port Royal, and became one of the great ornaments of that society. His "History of the Emperors and other Princes who reigned during the first six Christian Centuries," and "Ecclesiastical History," are written with great fidelity and clearness. n. at Paris, 1637; n. 1693.

TILLOCH, Alexander, til'-lok, a Scotch philosophical writer and inventor, who in early life applied himself to making improvements in the art of printing. With Foulis, the eminent printer of Glasgow, he made some experiments with a view of perfecting the process invented by Ged of Edinburgh, of making casts of pages of type. It was not, however, until thirty years later, that, in consequence of his representations to Earl Stanhope, the process of stereotyping became practically applicable. In 1787 he repaired to London, and there became part-proprietor and editor of a daily evening newspaper called the "Star." In 1790 he offered to the English government a plan for preventing the forgery of bank-notes, which not being entertained, he put himself into communication with the French authorities. His negotiations upon this subject were, however, brought to a sudden termination by the passing of the Treasonable Correspondence Bill. In 1797 he started the "Philosophical Magazine," and likewise commenced the publication of the "Meehanic's Oracle." Of sincere but peculiar religious opinions, he became an elder or minister of a small congregation who styled themselves Christian Dissenters, and celebrated worship in a private house. In 1823 he produced a work entitled "Dissertations Introductory to the Study and Right Understanding of the Language, Structure, and Contents of the Apocalypse." He was a LL.D., and member of many learned societies; but upon being proposed for election as a fellow of the Royal Society, he was declared unfitted to receive that distinction, on the ground that he was proprietor of a newspaper. He continued to edit the "Star" and the "Philosophical Magazine" until within a short period of his decease. The latter publication, after Tilloch's retirement from it, passed into the hands of Mr. Richard Taylor. Besides the works already mentioned, he produced a series of papers upon theological subjects, under the name of "Bibliens." n. at Glasgow, 1759; n. 1825.

TILLOTSON, John, til'-lot-son, an eminent English prelate, who was the son of a clothier, and received his education at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow in 1651. Though bred among the Puritans, he conformed, at the Restoration, to the Church of England, and became curate of Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire. In 1664 he was chosen preacher to the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and, in the following year, lecturer of St. Lawrence's Church, Jewry. In 1668 he took his degree of D.D.; in 1670 he was made prebendary, and, two years afterwards, dean of Canterbury. He attended Lord Russell on the scaffold, and endeavoured to prevail on him to acknowledge the doctrine of non-resistance, a principle which the doctor himself had afterwards occasion to renounce. He was very zealous against popery in the reign of James II., and immediately after the Revolution became the confidential friend of William III., who bestowed upon him the archbishopric of Canterbury, after the deprivation of Dr. Sancroft. This drew upon him the hatred of the non-jurors, who put forth many severe animadversions upon him. His sermons, published after his death, are distinguished by their perspicuity and closeness of reasoning. His widow, who was a niece of Oliver Cromwell, was left only what might accrue from the sale of the archbishop's works. These writings were, however, so popular, that the lady obtained, it is stated, the sum of £2500. William III., to evince his esteem for Dr. Tillotson, granted his widow a pension of £400, and at a subsequent period added a second one amounting to £200, which she continued to receive until her death. Tillotson's works were edited and published by Birch, in 3 vols., in 1752. s. at Sowerby, Yorkshire, 1630; p. 1694.

TILLY, or TILLI, John Tserclas, Count, ti'l-le, a celebrated general, who was for some time a member of the order of Jesuits, which he quitted for a military life. He displayed great courage and talents in Hungary against the Turks, and in 1620 held the command of the troops under Duke Maximilian, at the battle of Prague. He exhibited superior abilities in numerous actions in the German wars, and was no less distinguished by his humanity. He was at last defeated by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and received a mortal wound in defending the passage of the Lech, in 1632. s. at the castle of Tilly, South Brabant, 1559.

TIMÆUS OF LOCRI, ti-me-us, a Greek philosopher, who was a disciple of Pythagoras. He held that there was a universal motion throughout nature. A short treatise by him, on the "Nature of the Soul and of the World," is extant, and is stated to have given to Plato the ideas which are elaborated under the head of Timæus, in the "Dialogues" of that philosopher. Flourished about 340 B.C.

TIMAGENES, ti-mäg'-e-nēs, a historian, who was a native of Alexandria, and became a slave, at Rome, to the son of Sylla. His master gave him his liberty, on account of his abilities. He was afterwards in the service of Augustus, but lost his favour; on which he burnt the history of the reign of that emperor which he had written. Flourished about the close of the last century B.C.

TIMANTHES, ti-mün'-theēs, a painter of Sicily, whose greatest work was "The Sacrifice of Iphigenia." He obtained the prize in a contest wherein the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was for painting an Ajax, with all the fury which his disappointment could occasion when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Flourished about 400 B.C.

TIMMS, John, tims, a modern English littérateur, who commenced his career under the auspices of Sir Richard Phillips, the publisher, whose amanuensis he became. From 1827 to 1838 he continued editor of "The Mirror," and shortly after the establishment of "The Illustrated London News," in 1842, he was appointed one of the editors of that journal. He produced more than a hundred volumes, either original or compiled; the best known of which were, "Curiosities of London;" "Things not generally known familiarly Explained;" "The Year-Book of Facts," and "Curiosities of History." s. in London, 1801.

TIMOLEON, ti-mo'-le-on, a celebrated Corinthian general and statesman. His elder brother Timophanes, aiming at the sovereign power, was slain by Timoleon, assisted by his brother Satyrus. He went afterwards to relieve the Syracusans from the tyranny of Dionysius, whom he compelled to flee. Timoleon spent the rest of his life at Syracuse, whose laws he amended, and whose popular liberties he established. p. 337 B.C.

TIMON, ti'-mon, styled the Misanthrope, was a native of Colyttus, in Attica. In consequence of being deceived in the friendships he had formed, he declared himself the enemy of the human race, and lived secluded from mankind. He formed a subject of ridicule in the comedies of Aristophanes and Antiphanes, and his name has been rendered immortal by Shakspeare. He lived during the Peloponnesian war.

TIMOTHEUS, ti-mo'-the-us, a poet and musician of Miletus. He was the friend of Euripides, and received an immense sum from the Ephesians for a poem in honour of Diana. Only a few fragments of his works have been preserved. p. 357 B.C.

TIMOTHEUS, a celebrated Athenian general, who was the son of Conon and the disciple of Isocrates. Placed in command of the Athenian fleet in 375 B.C., he, in order to avert an invasion of Thebes by the Lacedæmonians, took Coreyra, Cephalonia, and Arcunia. He was a second time nominated admiral of a fleet of sixty ships; but his enemies having been able to produce a strong feeling against him at Athens, he was recalled. He was brought to trial; and although his innocence of the charges urged against him was well established, he was only liberated through the interference of Alcetas the Molossian, and Jason of Pheræ. In 361 B.C. he again held a naval command, and proceeding to the Hellespont, captured several towns. A reconciliation took place between him and his rival Iphicrates, in 357 B.C. The two commanders sailed to reduce Samos and the other rebellious allies of Athens; but the expedition proving unsuccessful, the Athenians were compelled to conclude a peace, which brought to a termination the Social War. Timotheus and his colleagues were subsequently accused of having taken bribes from the Chians and Rhodians. He was fined 100 talents, which being unable to pay, he retired to Chalcis, in Eubœa, where he died, 354 B.C. His countrymen afterwards acknowledged the injustice with which they had acted towards him, and nine-tenths of the penalty was remitted.

TIMUR, Sultan, or TAMERLANE, ti-moor, a celebrated Tartar conqueror, who was of Mongol origin, and was a descendant of Genghis Khan. He became a soldier in his twelfth year, and at that early age evinced unusual courage and an enterprising disposition. Having become chief of the tribe of the Ierlas in 1361, he made himself master of Balk, the capital of Khorassan, after which he made an easy conquest of the province of Candahar. In this war he was wounded in the thigh, and became lame for life, being called, in consequence, Timur-ienk, "lame Timur," which term has been corrupted by the Europeans into Tamerlane. He next subdued the whole of ancient Persia, and then took Bagdad. Flushed with his success, he marched into India, where he took Delhi, the capital, and thus gained possession of immense treasures. But while he was engaged in this expedition, Bagdad revolted; on which he hastened back, delivered the city up to pillage, and put to death 90,000 persons. He also invaded Syria, and took Damascus. During this successful career the Greek emperor and some inferior princes implored his assistance against Bajazet, emperor of the Turks. Tamerlane sent to him to withdraw from before Constantinople, and to replace the princes whom he had deposed. Bajazet returned a fierce answer; on which Tamerlane marched against him, and, after a battle of three days, the Turkish emperor was defeated and taken prisoner. Different and very irreconcilable accounts are given of the conqueror's treatment of his captive. Some assert that he was confined in an iron cage, and exposed to scorn and contempt; while others relate that Tamerlane behaved to him and his family with the greatest liberality. The last account appears to be the best founded. Tamerlane fixed the seat of his vast empire at Samarcand, where he received the homage of numerous sovereigns, and, amongst the rest, the ambassadors of the emperor Manuel Palæologus and Henry III., king of Castile. Having resolved to make the conquest of China, he set out with his army, but died on the march. For an account of the extraordinary career of this conqueror, see Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." b. at Sebz, near Samarcand, 1335; d. at Otrar, on the Jaxartes, 1405.

TINDAL, Matthew, tin'-dal, an English deistical writer, who was educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of All-Souls College, and took his degree of doctor of laws. He embraced the Roman Catholic faith in the reign of James II., but professed himself a Protestant, and took the oaths at the Revolution. His works are, "The Rights of the Christian Church;" the design of which work was to show the inutility of the clergy; "Christianity as Old as the Creation," in which he endeavoured to undermine revelation. It was answered by several able writers, particularly Conybeare, Leland, and Foster. His writings have been characterized as contemptible by his opponents, while, on the other hand, his admirers claim for them learning and great logical power. b. at Beer-Ferris, Devonshire, about 1657; d. in London, 1733.

TINDAL, Rev. Nicholas, an English historian, who was nephew of the preceding, received his education at Exeter College, Oxford, and became fellow of Trinity College, rector of Colbourne, in the Isle of Wight, and chaplain to Greenwich Hospital. His most important works were, a translation and continuation of Rapin's "History of England," and an abridgment of Spence's "Polymetia." a. 1687; d. at Greenwich Hospital, 1774.

TINTORETTO, Giacomo Robusti, surnamed, tin'-to-rait'-to, a famous Italian painter, was a disciple of Titian, who, fearing that he would become a powerful rival, dismissed him. He was called the furious Tintoretto, from the bold manner of his painting and the rapidity of his execution. He was a great but very unequal painter; his countrymen saying of him, that he possessed three pencils—one of gold, one of silver, and one of iron; alluding to the inequality of his efforts. He was the son of a dyer: whence his agnomen. b. at Venice, 1512; d. at the same city, 1594.

TIPPOO SAIB, tip'-poo-sa'-eeb, sultan of Mysore, was the son of Hyder Ali, whom he succeeded in the government of his kingdom, which he defended with success against the Great Mogul. In 1790 he engaged in a war with the English, and was defeated in a number of actions. In 1793 Lord Cornwallis obliged him to sue for peace, when Tipgoo delivered his two sons as hostages. The war was resumed in 1799, and terminated with the entire conquest of Mysore and the death of Tipgoo, who fell bravely fighting on the ramparts of Seringapatam, his capital. His library was stored with valuable MSS., which are now in the College of Calcutta. b. 1749.

TIRABOSCHI, Girolamo, te-ra-bos'-ke, a celebrated Italian writer, who was a member of the society of Jesuits, and professor of rhetoric at Milan; but, upon the suppression of the order, the duke of Modena appointed him his librarian, and he was enrolled among the nobility of that city. His principal works are, "Memoirs on the Ancient Order of Homilies;" "History of the Writers of Modena;" "History of Italian Literature, from the Age of Augustus." b. at Bergamo, 1731; d. at Modena, 1794.

TIRIDATES I., ti-ri-dai'-tees, king of Armenia, was the brother of Vologeses, king of the Parthians, by whom he had been placed upon the throne. The Romans would not permit Armenia to become a possession of the Parthians, and Corbulo, the general of Nero, marched against Tiridates and Vologeses, and defeated them in several engagements. Subsequently, Tiridates consented to become a vassal king of the Roman emperor, and, in 68 A.D., made a journey to Rome, in order to receive his crown from the emperor Nero.

TIRIDATES II., surnamed the Great, became king of Armenia in 259. His youth had been passed at Rome, whither he had been taken in 232, upon the assassination of his father. The Romans placed him upon the throne; but the Parthians having invaded his kingdom while he was absent at Rome, he returned immediately, and subsequently totally defeated them. He was at first strongly opposed to Christianity, but was afterwards converted. d. 314.

TISCHBEIN, tish'-bine, John Henry, a celebrated German painter, who excelled in historical and mythological subjects. His best works are contained in the churches of his native country. b. 1722; d. 1789.

TISCHBEIN, John Henry William, an eminent German painter, who was the nephew of the preceding. He studied historical painting under his uncle, and acquired a knowledge of landscape from the tuition of John Jacob, at Hamburg. On visiting Italy, he became very popular there, and was appointed director of the Academy at Naples. Returning to Germany, he resided chiefly at Hamburg and in the environs of Lubeck. His most remarkable paintings were an "Ajax" and "Cassandra," and an altarpiece painted for the church of St. Angari at Bremen. While at Naples, he made the acquaintance of Sir William Hamilton, the English ambassador and art-patron, for whom he made drawings of the ancient vases in his collection. He excelled in drawing animals, and produced a very fine work, entitled "Heads of Various Animals, drawn from Nature, to serve as a correct indication of their Character." Portraits of Heyne, Blucher, and Klopstock were painted by him, and he likewise produced a fine collection of drawings illustrative of Homer (the letter-press for which was written by Heyne), and a number of etchings after Paul Potter, Rembrandt, Roos, and Rosa di Tivoli. n. at Hayna, 1751; p. 1829.—There were other members of his family who became celebrated as painters and designers.

TISSOT, Simon Andrew, tis'-so, an eminent Swiss physician, who distinguished himself in advocating inoculation, and also in recommending an experimental practice of physic. His medical works, particularly his "Advice to People concerning their Health," are excellent. n. at Lausanne, 1728; p. 1797.

TITIAN, Tiziano Vecellio, commonly called, tish'-yan, a celebrated Italian painter, whose first master was Giovanni Bellini, in his time the greatest painter of Venice. Titian adopted his style; but, on becoming acquainted with the works of Giorgione, he altered his manner, and contracted an intimacy with that great artist. The reputation of Titian rose rapidly, and the emperor Charles V. conferred on him the honour of knighthood and a pension. He painted history, portraits, and landscape in a superb style. A "Last Supper," in the Escorial in Spain, and one at Milan, representing "Christ crowned with Thorns," are among his finest works; but Venice and Madrid contain many remarkable efforts of his genius. His patron, Charles V., held him in the highest regard; and, upon one occasion, Titian happening to let his brush fall upon the ground, the emperor instantly picked it up, and restored it to the great painter, saying, "Titiano è degno essere servito da Cesare" (Titian is worthy of being served by Caesar). n. at Capo del Cadore, in the Venetian states, 1477; p. at Venice, 1576.

TITE, Sir William, tite, an English architect, who was selected to make the designs for the Royal Exchange, which was commenced in 1841, and finished in three years, being opened in state by her Majesty Queen Victoria in 1844. The building was erected at a cost of £150,000. After the successful execution of this work, he became one of the most extensively-employed architects of his day; his principal designs being for the Blackwall terminus of the London and Blackwall Railway, several stations upon the Southampton line of railway; the terminus at Southampton, and the old terminus at Vauxhall. He represented the city of Bath in Parliament for several years; and was a director of several public institutions. n. in London, 1802.

TITSINGH, Isaac, tis'-sing, an eminent traveller, who was employed in the service of the Dutch East India Company. He resided in Japan, Batavia, and China during thirty-one years. The government in Batavia appointed him, in 1794, as chief of the embassy dispatched to Peking, a mission which he prosecuted with complete success. He published nothing during his life, but supplied Marsden, De Guignes, and other writers, with valuable information. After his death, his museum and MSS. were unfortunately dispersed; but M. Nepvin and M. Abel Rémusat succeeded in obtaining some of his notes, from which valuable works were published. The titles of these were, "The Marriage, Funeral, and other Ceremonies practised in Japan," and "Memoirs and Anecdotes of the Reigning Dynasty of Japan; with an Appendix upon the Poetry of the Japanese, and upon their Mode of Dividing the Year." Both these works were translated into English in 1823. In the "Annales des Voyages" there is an account of the island of Yesso, translated from the Japanese by Titsingh. One of the greatest treasures of the Bibliothèque du Roi—the "Japanese Encyclopedia"—was procured from Titsingh. n. at Amsterdam, 1710; p. 1812.

TITTMANN, John Augustus Henry, tis'-man, a German theologian and writer, who became first professor of theology to the university of Leipzig. He advocated at the Congress of Vienna a plan for uniting the German Protestant communities, and granting to them an ecclesiastical constitution; and also distinguished himself in the chamber of the Saxon deputies as the mouthpiece of the university of Leipzig. He wrote extensively, in German and Latin, upon theology, edited the Greek text of the New Testament, and produced a History of the Protestant Church in Germany, which, however, was left incomplete at his death. n. at Langensalza, 1773; p. 1831.

TITUS LIVIUS. (See LIVIUS.)

TITUS, Flavius Vespasianus, tis'-tus, a Roman emperor, was the son of the emperor Vespasianus. He served under his father, and distinguished himself at the siege of Jerusalem. He obtained the imperial dignity in 79. In his youth he was somewhat dissipated and extravagant, which gave room to fear that he would prove another Tiberius or Nero, but his subsequent conduct showed that these apprehensions were groundless. He became the pattern of virtue and the father of his people; reformed the courts of law, severely punished false accusers, and forgave those who had conspired against his own life. During his reign, Agricola restored peace to Britain; and after marching as far north as the Frith of Tay, erected a wall to serve as a defence against the incursions of the Caledonians. Titus was so much beloved by his subjects as to be named by them "the delight of the human race." n. 40; p. 81.

TOBIN, John, to'-bin, an English dramatist, who exercised the profession of a solicitor in London, but devoted his leisure to the composition of plays, which he offered to the different London theatres, without success. At length his assiduous efforts, undermining a naturally weak constitution, led to his death. His comedy of "The Honeymoon" was produced a few weeks after this event, and met with a very great success. It is written in imitation of the Shaksperian drama, and still keeps the stage. Other works of his were subsequently brought out, but they did not become popular. His unacted plays, together with a memoir of his life, were published in 1820. n. at Salisbury, 1770; p. 1804.

TOCQUEVILLE, Henry Alexis de, tok'-ueel, a celebrated French political writer, who, after completing his education was, in 1832 dispatched, with M. de Beaumont, to the United States of America for the purpose of making researches upon the working of democratic institutions. The result of this mission appeared in his valuable work, entitled "De la Démocratie en Amérique," produced in 1835. Four years later he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies. After the Revolution of 1848 he was nominated vice-president of the Assembly, and soon afterwards became one of the ministry under the presidency of Louis Napoleon. He was one of those who were divested of power by the coup d'état. Devoting the remaining years of his life to philosophical researches into history, he produced, "Philosophical History of the Reign of Louis XV.," "A Glance at the Reign of Louis XVI.," and "L'Ancien Régime et la Révolution," which was translated into English under the title of "On the State of Society in France before the Revolution of 1788, and on the Causes which led to that Event." He was a member of the French Academy. b. 1805; d. 1859.

TOD, Lieut.-Colonel James, to-d, an English

produced two valuable works upon India, are entitled, respectively, "The Annals of Rajast'han," containing the geography, antiquities, and history of Rajpootana; and "Travels in Western India." He was distinguished by his ability while political agent in Rajpootana, one of whose towns, Bheelwara, which had been laid in ruins by the Maharrattas, was restored by him. One of the merchants of the renovated city said, "it ought to be called Todgunge; but there is no need, for we shall never forget him." b. 1782; d. 1835.

TODD, Rev. Henry John, an English writer, who became archdeacon of Cleveland, chaplain in ordinary to her Majesty, and produced, among other important works, "The Poems of Edmund Spenser, with Notes and a Life;" "Illustrations of the Lives and Writings of John Gower and Geoffrey Chaucer;" "A Vindication of our Authorized Translation of the Bible." b. 1763; d. 1845.

TODD, Robert Bentley, an eminent modern physician and writer, who became physician to King's College Hospital on its establishment. In 1836 he commenced the publication of his important work entitled "Cyclopædia of Anatomy and Physiology," in which he was assisted by the most eminent of the scientific men of the time. He was also the author of "The Physiological Anatomy and Physiology of Man;" "On the Anatomy of the Brain, Spinal Cord, and Ganglions;" and "On Gout and Rheumatic Fever." b. in Ireland, about 1810; d. 1860.

TODLEBEN, Francis Edward, tot-lai'-ben, a celebrated Russian general of engineers, who, while serving with the Russian army in Sebastopol, was selected to place the southern side of that fortress in a state of defence against the attacks of the allied English and French forces. In this undertaking, Todleben evinced the highest talents as a military engineer. Earthworks and enormous ramparts sprang up, under his direction, at every point that was about to be attacked. For a considerable period his extraordinary works kept the allies in check, and it was owing to the strength and completeness of his Malakhoff, Redan, and Flagstaff batteries, that the siege was so long protracted. Todleben's genius was rapidly acknowledged: he was only second captain of engineers when he went to the Crimea, but at the fall of Sebastopol he had risen to the rank of general. In the last days of the siege he was wounded in the leg. b. at Mitau, in Courland, 1818.

TOGHAI, to'-grai, an eminent Arabic poet, who became vizier to Masoud, the sultan of Mosul. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Esterabad, near Hamadan, in 1122, by Mahmoud, the Seljukian sultan of Persia, who subsequently put the poet to death. Besides his poems, he wrote a work upon alchemy. One of his works was translated into Latin by Picoeoke, and published at Oxford in 1601. Another poem was translated into English by Leon Chappilow, and produced at Cambridge in 1753. Flourished in the 11th century.

TOLAND, John, to'-land, a deistical writer, who was educated in Ireland, in the Roman Catholic faith, but, at the age of 15, became a Protestant, and afterwards went to the university of Glasgow, whence he removed to Edinburgh. After visiting Leyden and Oxford, he returned to Ireland, which country he was obliged to leave to avoid the persecutions to which he was subjected for writing a work called "Christianity not Mysterious." In 1698 he published the "Life of Milton," which was followed by a deistical work, entitled "Nuzarencus," and several other books of a like tendency. His posthumous works were printed in 1726. b. in Ireland, either in 1669 or 1670; d. at Palmer, 1722.

TOLEDO, Don Pedro de, to-lai'-do, an eminent Spanish general, who distinguished himself in the expedition against Jean D'Aubret, king of Navarre, in 1512. In 1533 he was appointed, by Charles V., viceroy of Naples, in which office he displayed considerable talent, and inaugurated many useful measures; he evinced, however, great intolerance towards the Jews, whom he drove from the kingdom; and also attempted to establish the Inquisition; but a terrible insurrection ensuing, the emperor abolished the hated tribunal in the following year (1541). The Prince of Sanseverino, the patron of the father of Torquato Tasso, was one of the leaders of this insurrection, and was in consequence compelled to retire to France. (See Tasso, Torquato.) In 1552 a Turkish fleet entered the Bay of Naples, intending to await the arrival of a French squadron with the exiled Neapolitan princes on board, and afterwards to attack the city; but Toledo succeeded, by means of a large bribe, in inducing the Mohammedans to retire before the junction with the French. Soon afterwards he prepared to march against the French, who had entered Sienna; but his death occurred before he could reach the place. b. near Salamanca, 1434; d. at Florence, 1553.

TOLER, John, Earl of Norbury, to'-ler, chief justice of the court of Common Pleas in Ireland, was called to the bar in 1770; appointed king's counsel in 1781, solicitor-general in 1789, attorney-general in 1793, during which year he was actively engaged in the prosecution of the Irish rebels; and was advanced to the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas in 1800, with the title of Lord Norbury. This high office he retained till 1827, when, on his retirement, he obtained a pension of £3000 a year, and was advanced to the title of Viscount Glandine and Earl of Norbury. He was an able judge; but was chiefly known from his reputation for wit and drollery, and the fact that "Lord Norbury's jokes" were sprinkled very thickly with his law. In his time the Dublin court of Common Pleas was designated the "racket court," and was often thronged with idlers attracted by the amusement furnished by the sallies of wit and repartee so freely bandied about from judge, counsel, and witnesses. b. in Tipperary, 1745; d. 1831.

TOLOMEI, Claudio, to'-lo-may'-e, an Italian poet and orator, and excellent letter-writer, who wrote several esteemed works, the principal of which are his volumes of letters, "Lettere di Claudio Tolomei." He also wrote several speeches that he had delivered on certain occasions. a. at Siena, 1492; d. at Rome, 1555.

TOMLINE, Dr. George, tom'-lin, an English prelate, who was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which college he was, in 1773, elected fellow. In 1782 he became private secretary to Mr. Pitt, at that time appointed chancellor of the exchequer. Tomline occupied the same post under Pitt when the latter became first lord of the treasury. After receiving some preferment in the church, he was, in 1787, advanced to the bishopric of Lincoln, which see he continued to hold during more than 32 years, refusing, in the interim, the bishopric of London. In 1820 he became bishop of Winchester. In addition to a large number of sermons, he was the author of "The Elements of Christian Theology;" "A Refutation of Calvinism;" and "Memoirs of Mr. Pitt." His original name was Pretyman, which he changed to that of Tomline on succeeding to the estates of Marmaduke Tomline, Esq., of "by Grove, Lincolnshire. a. at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, 1750; d. 1827.

TONE, Theobald Wolfe, tone, the founder of the society of United Irishmen. Compelled to flee from Ireland, he repaired to France, and induced the Directory to dispatch an expedition to Ireland, of which he was appointed adjutant.

He was taken prisoner, and d. in prison in 1795.

TOWSTALL, or TUNSTALL, Cuthbert, ton'-stall, a learned English prelate, who studied at Oxford, Cambridge, and Padua, and was accounted the best mathematician of his time. He was consecrated bishop of London in 1523; in the following year made lord privy seal; and in 1530 translated to Durham, of which he was deprived in the reign of Elizabeth, for refusing to take the oath of supremacy. He wrote, among other works, "A Treatise on Arithmetic;" "A Defence of Transubstantiation;" and an abridgment of Aristotle's "Ethics." a. in Yorkshire, 1474-75; d. at Lambeth, 1559.

TONTI, Lorenzo, ton'-te, an Italian banker, who was established in Paris, and there introduced a species of life annuity in 1653, which was called after his name. The scheme was also introduced into England, but was not continued after 1769, the date of the last tontine.

TOOKE, Andrew, took, an English divine, who became successively usher and master of the Charterhouse school, and also professor of geometry at Gresham College. He published the Abbé Pomey's "Pantheon" in English, without acknowledging the real author. a. in London, 1673; d. 1731.

TOOKE, John Horne, an English politician and philologist, who received his education at Westminster and Eton, and afterwards at St. John's College, Cambridge. In compliance with the wishes of his father, he entered into holy orders, although he himself strongly disliked the ecclesiastical profession. After travelling upon the continent as tutor to the sons of several gentlemen, he, in 1773, relinquished his clerical engagements, and commenced the study of the law. He had already taken an active part in political discussion, and had exerted himself to procure the return of his friend Wilkes as member for Middlesex, in 1768. a.

While a student of the law, he gave great assistance to Mr. William Tooke upon the question of an inclosure bill; in gratitude for which service the latter gentleman made him his heir. This was the origin of his adding to his original name of John Horne, that of Tooke. After quarrelling with Wilkes, with whom, as well as Junius, he carried on a spirited controversy, he, upon the outbreak of the American war, attacked the English ministry, and made a proposal for a subscription for the widows and orphans of those Americans who had been "murdered by the king's troops at Lexington and Concord." For this proceeding, he was brought to trial upon a charge of libel, found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of £200, and to be imprisoned for twelve months. After regaining his liberty, he applied to be admitted to practise at the bar; but was rejected, on the ground of his having previously taken holy orders. Retiring into Huntingdonshire, he for a time occupied himself with literary studies, and composed a short work in favour of parliamentary reform. In 1788 he produced the first volume of his celebrated "Diversions of Purley." In 1784 he was arrested upon a charge of high treason, and after a trial of six days, during which he displayed considerable intrepidity, he was acquitted. Having twice previously sought the suffrages of the citizens of Westminster with almost entire success, he became a member for the borough of Old Sarum in 1801. He retained his seat less than a year; for, after the dissolution in 1801, he could not regain it, in consequence of the passing of an act which disqualified any one holding priest's orders from representing a constituency in the House of Commons. Thereupon he retired into private life. A good edition of his "Diversions" was produced by Mr. R. a. in London, 1738; d. at Winchester, 1812.

TOOKE, Rev. William, an English divine and writer, who became chaplain to the factory of the Russian Company at St. Petersburg. He was the author of "Life of Catharine II.," "A View of the Russian Empire," and other works. a. 1744; d. in London, 1820.

TOOKE, Thomas, a modern English writer upon political economy, who was the son of the preceding. His most important works were "A History of Prices and the State of the Circulation," and "Brief Sketch of the State of the Corn-trade in the last Two Centuries." now known as the "History of Prices." a. at St. Petersburg, 1774; d. 1853.

TOOKE, William, younger brother of the preceding, produced an edition of the works of Churchill, which was subsequently included in the collection of English authors called the 'Aldine Poets.' He also wrote "The Monarchy of France; its Rise, Progress, and Fall;" and upon the establishment of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, in promoting which he took an active part, he became treasurer. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. a. at St. Petersburg, 1777; d. 1863.

TORRES, to-pa'-tai, a Spanish admiral, who took an active part in inducing the navy to join in the revolution which drove Isabella II. from the throne of Spain. He was minister of marine, under the provisional government of 1808, and the regency of 1809 (see PRIM, SERRANO.)

TOPFFER, Charles, te(r)-p'-fer, a modern German author, who produced several excellent comedies, which were favourites upon the German stage, and some novels, which have been translated into English. B. at Berlin, 1792.

TOPHAM, Thomas, top'-ham, an Englishman of great muscular strength. He kept a public-house at Islington, and used to perform surprising feats; such as breaking a broomstick of the largest size by striking it against his bare arm; lifting two hogsheds of water; heaving his horse over the turnpike-gate; carrying the beam of a house as a soldier would his firelock. He could also roll up a pewter dish of seven pounds as a man rolls up a sheet of paper; squeeze a pewter quart pot together at arm's length; and lift two hundredweight with his little finger over his head. At Derby he broke a rope fastened to the floor, that would sustain twenty hundredweight; and lifted an oak table, six feet long, with his teeth, though half a hundredweight was hung at the extremity. He raised a man who weighed twenty-seven stone, with one hand. He stabbed himself, after quarrelling with and wounding his wife, in 1749.

TORLADY, Augustus Montague, top'-la-de, a zealous advocate for the Calvinism of the Church of England, was born at Farnham, in Surrey, educated at Westminster School, and at Trinity College, Dublin; and became vicar of Broadhembury, in Devonshire. He was a strenuous opponent of Wesley, and brought a large share of metaphysical acuteness into the Calvinistic controversy. His works form 6 volumes. B. 1740; D. 1778.

TORDENSKIOLD, tor'-dens-kyold, a celebrated Danish admiral, who was at first a barber's apprentice; but his love for a seafaring life led him to abandon this employment, and to enter the navy as a sailor. His conduct was so good that his captain got him appointed midshipman in the royal navy. After distinguishing himself as captain of a privateer, he was appointed to the command of a frigate, in which, during the war with Sweden, he performed prodigies of valour and seamanship. In 1715 he destroyed several Swedish vessels, and captured a large frigate; for which he was made a commodore, and placed in command of a squadron in the Baltic. In 1716 he engaged the Swedish fleet of more than double the number of his own, and, in an hour, captured three ships of the line and two frigates. Charles XII. of Sweden, expecting to witness the defeat of the Danes, had taken up his position in the island of Rugen, but had to behold the discomfiture of his own navy. In the same year, Tordenskiold also gained the battles of Dyneskieln and Stromstadt, for which he was ennobled under the name of Tordenskiold (shield against thunder), his original name having been Peter Wessel. In 1717 he took Marstrand, a strong fortress belonging to the Swedes, in the Cattagat. Peace being proclaimed in 1720, he solicited permission to travel, which being reluctantly granted by his sovereign, he proceeded to Hamburg, where his companion, a wealthy native of Copenhagen, lost considerable sums to one Colonel De Stahl, a Swede. Tordenskiold afterwards encountered the gambler at Hanover, where the admiral had gone in order to be presented to George II. At a dinner-party in this city, he met De Stahl, and expressing his intention not to sit at table with him, a quarrel ensued. A hostile meeting was arranged for the next day. The admiral went without a second, and armed only with a light sword; his opponent being provided with a very heavy weapon. At the commencement of the duel, Tordenskiold's blade was broken by De Stahl, who immediately ran him through the heart. In Denmark it was said that he had been subjected to foul play at the instance of a high personage. B. at Trondheim, Norway, 1691; killed, 1720.

TORRELLI, Giuseppe, to-rail'-le, a celebrated Italian mathematician, who produced an edition in Greek and Latin of the whole of the works of Archimedes. His death taking place immediately after he had concluded this undertaking, the work remained in manuscript, and being purchased by the university of Oxford, was printed there under the direction of Dr. Robertson in 1792. B. at Verona, 1721; D. 1781.

TORRELLI, Lælio, or TAURELLIUS, an eminent Italian jurist, who was employed in various high employments by Pope Clement VIII. until about 1528, when, having become involved in a dispute with the Malatesti family, he took refuge under the protection of the Medici at Florence. In 1546 he rose to be chief secretary to the grand-duke. He produced, among other learned works, an edition of the "Pandects of Justinian." B. at Fano, 1489; D. at Florence, 1576.

TORREUS TORMODUS, the Latin form of the names of Thormod Thorvesson, a native of Iceland, who, in 1682, became historiographer to Christian V., king of Denmark. He wrote the history of Norway, containing also the annals of the northern parts of Scotland, from the year 850 to 1206. D. 1718.

TORQUEMADA, Thomas de, tor'-kê-ma'-da, the first inquisitor-general of Spain, whose memory is rendered infamous for barbarity, was a monk of the order of St. Dominic, and became inquisitor-general in 1483. During the exercise of his power, in the course of 16 years, it is said that no less than 8800 victims were committed to the flames, 90,000 were condemned to perpetual imprisonment and other severe punishments, and above 80,000 Jews were banished from Spain. B. about 1420; D. 1498.

TORRENO, Don José, Count de, tor'-rai'-no, a Spanish statesman and writer, who, in 1808, was sent to London to request assistance against Napoleon I. After residing for a short time in England, he returned to Madrid, and took his seat in the Cortes, where he became a prominent advocate for the constitution of 1812. His political views gave umbrage to the despotic Ferdinand; and when the Cortes was dissolved, and many of its members thrown into prison, Torrenno narrowly escaped sharing a similar fate. After reaching Portugal, he subsequently made his way to England once more. His estates were confiscated during his absence, and a formal sentence of death passed upon him. After the revolution of 1820 he was permitted to return to Madrid, and was offered the post of prime minister by the king, but refused the place. The second French invasion having restored Ferdinand as an absolute monarch, Torrenno was sent into exile, and spent ten years in England, Germany, and France. Allowed to return to his native country in consequence of the amnesty of 1832, he remained a private citizen till 1834, when he was appointed minister of finance by Queen Christina. In the succeeding year he was driven to resign, and in the course of the following eight years, was twice sent into exile. His "History of the Insurrection, War, and Revolution of Spain," was composed in Paris and London, and is considered the best work upon the subject in the Spanish language. b. at Oviedo, 1786; d. at Paris, 1843.

TORRENS, Sir Henry, tor'-rens, adjutant-general of the British army, received his education in the military academy at Dublin; entered as an ensign in the 52nd regiment of foot, and, going to the West Indies, was early distinguished for bravery in action, and patience in enduring hardships. He afterwards served in Holland, where he was wounded; next proceeded to join the army in Egypt; thence embarked at a port of the Red Sea for Bombay; but receiving a sun-stroke, was obliged to take passage for England. The ship touched at St. Helena, where he married Miss Patton, the governor's daughter. He was present at the unsuccessful attack on Buenos Ayres, and subsequently became secretary to Sir Arthur Wellesley, whom he accompanied to Portugal, and shared in the succeeding campaigns. In March, 1820, Sir Henry was named adjutant-general, in which situation he revised the army regulations, and introduced many important improvements. b. at Londonderry, 1779; d. 1823.

TORRENTIUS, John, tor-ren-shi-us, a Dutch painter, who founded a sect of Adamites; for which he was sent to prison, and confined during some time. His pictures are well painted, but are very obscene. b. 1589; d. 1640.

TORRES, L. da Motta, tor'-es, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who was engaged in the war against France, and in 1797-8, commanded the floating batteries which were intrusted with the defence of the mouth of the Tagus. He afterwards became governor of Brazil; fought against the French in 1808, and was, during the interval, 1816-20, captain-general of Angola, in Africa. Returning to Lisbon in 1821, he became an energetic opponent of the reform of the Cortes. b. at Lisbon, 1769; d. 1823.

TORRICELLI, Evangelista, tor-re-chel'-le, a celebrated Italian mathematician and philosopher, who, after receiving his education at Faenza, repaired to Rome, where he greatly improved himself under Castelli. In Rome he wrote two small works upon mechanics, which being read by Galileo, that distinguished philosopher pressed him to join him at Florence. After some time, Torricelli repaired thither, and lived in the most intimate friendship with Galileo during the last days of the philosopher, whom he succeeded in the professorship of mathematics at the Academy of Florence. He is celebrated as the inventor of the barometer, and for his improvements in microscopes and telescopes. He made the discovery of the principle of the barometer while experimenting with columns of mercury contained in tubes, as to the pressure of the atmosphere. By these experiments he also proved that the opinion long maintained, that "Nature abhors a vacuum," was unfounded. b. 1608; d. 1647.

TORRIGIANO, Pietro, tor-id-je-a'-no, a celebrated Italian sculptor, who, while pursuing his studies with Michael Angelo in the Garden of Antiquities at Florence, becoming jealous of his great rival, struck him so violent a blow upon the nose as to disfigure it for ever. For this disgraceful act he was compelled to leave Florence, and after executing some commissions for Pope Alexander VI., he entered the army as a common soldier, and rose to the grade of ensign; but having modelled several bronze figures for some Florentine merchants, they requested him to visit England with them. 14

Toup

England he was employed by Henry VIII., who gave him the commission to execute the tomb of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey, for which he received £1000. In 1519 he went to Spain, where he was employed in carving statues for convents. Of one of these, a Virgin and Child, he was requested to make a copy for the duke of Arcos, in reward of which task he received a heap of maravedis, which, on discovering to be worth no more than thirty ducats, he was so enraged at the smallness of the sum, that he broke the figure into fragments. For this he was arrested by the Inquisition as a sacrilegious heretic, and was condemned. In order to avoid death at the hands of that sanguinary tribunal, he refused to take food, and so perished. b. about 1474; d. 1523.

TOSCANELLA, Paul, tos'-ka-nel'-la, a celebrated Italian astronomer, who erected, in the cathedral of Florence, the famous solstitial gnomon, which was accounted the greatest of the kind in Europe. Toscanella is likewise said to have had some ideas of the passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, and to have communicated them to Alphonso V. of Portugal, and afterwards to Columbus. b. at Florence, 1397; d. 1482.

TOTILA, to'-ti-la, king of the Ostrogoths, who conquered the kingdom of Italy from Justinian. In 545-47 he was defeated in several engagements by Belisarius; but after the departure of that general he regained possession of all the countries he had formerly taken. Slain in battle, 552.

TORR, François, Baron de, tot, a field-marshal and diplomatist in the service of France, the son of an Hungarian nobleman living in exile. After serving as an officer in a regiment of hussars, he accompanied his father to Constantinople, and subsequently received an appointment in the French embassy there, and, in 1767, was nominated consul in the Crimea. About 1777 he entered the Turkish service, reformed the artillery, defended the Dardanelles against the Russian fleet under Orloff, and fortified the mouth of the Bosphorus. Considering that his services were ill requited, he left Turkey, and, returning to France, was employed by the government to make a tour of inspection of the Mediterranean ports. In 1787 he was appointed governor of Douay, and held the post until 1790, when, having declared himself opposed to the revolutionists, he was obliged to flee. He was the author of a work upon the "Turks and Tartars." b. at Champigny, 1733; d. in Hungary, 1783.

TOULONGEON, François Emmanuel, Viscount de, too-lung'-je-awng, a French historian, who entered the army, and rose to the command of a regiment; but relinquished a military career some time previously to the outbreak of the Revolution. Although a noble, he embraced the popular cause, and was one of the deputies to the States-general. He was subsequently a member of the legislative body, and was created a commander of the Legion of Honour. His principal works were, a translation of Caesar's "Commentaries," with notes; "History of France from the Revolution of 1789;" "Reflections upon Revolution;" and a treatise upon the paintings of the ancient masters. He also wrote verses, but they possess little merit. b. in La Frauche-Comté, 1748; d. at Paris, 1812.

TOUR, Jonathan, toop, a learned English divine and critic, who, after entering into orders, obtained a prebend in Exeter Cathedral, and the rectory of St Martin's in Exeter. He published "Emendations of Suidas," an excellent edition of Longinus, and a volume of learned annotations upon the Greek writers. B. at St. Ives, Cornwall, 1713; D. 1785.

TOURNEFORT, Joseph Pitton de, toor'-ne-for, a celebrated French botanist, who, from his earliest years, evinced a strong predilection for the observation of nature. In 1677 he explored the mountains of Dauphiny and Savoy, and the year following went to Montpellier, where he studied physic; after which he travelled over the Pyrenees and into Catalonia, undergoing great difficulties and danger in searching for plants. In 1688 he travelled in England, Spain, Holland, and Portugal, cultivating his favourite science and winning the esteem of the learned men in each of those countries. He had previously been nominated assistant professor of botany in the Jardin du Roi, at Paris. In 1692 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1700 was sent to the East to collect plants. After two years' absence, he returned to his duties at the Jardin du Roi, and devoted the rest of his life to arranging his collections and writing an account of his travels and observations. His principal works are, "Elements of Botany;" "Travels in the Levant;" "History of the Plants round Paris;" "Treatise on the Materia Medica." B. at Aix, Provence, 1686; D. at Paris, 1708.

TOURNESENE, René Joseph, toor'-ne-meen, a learned French writer, who entered the society of the Jesuits, and was, during twenty years, engaged in teaching in the various colleges of his tion of Prideaux's "History of the Jews;" "Reflections upon Atheism;" an introduction to Fénelon upon the "Existence of God;" and a letter to Voltaire upon the "Immortality of the Soul." B. at Rennes, 1661; D. at Paris, 1739.

TOURNEUR, Pierre le. (See LÉTOURNEUR.)

TOURRETTE, Mark Anthony Louis Claret de la, toor'-rait', an eminent French botanist, who became member and secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Lyons. His principal works were, an elementary treatise upon botany, and some memoirs upon the same science in various journals and "Transactions" of learned French societies. B. at Lyons, 1729; D. 1793.

TOURVILLE, Anne Hilarion de Cotentin. Count de, toor'-veel, a celebrated French naval commander, who became captain in 1667, and distinguished himself under D'Estrées and Duquesne at the battles of Solebay and Augusta. In 1682-88 he participated in the expeditions to Tripoli and Algiers, and became vice-admiral in the Levant in 1689. In the following year he held a command under D'Estrées in the flotilla dispatched to Ireland to aid the cause of James II. In 1692 he was totally defeated by the English fleet at La Hogue; but he subsequently inflicted considerable damage upon British shipping in Portugal. B. in Normandy, 1642; D. 1701.

TOUSSAINT L'OUVREUR. (See L'OUVREUR, Toussaint.)

TOWERS, Joseph, tow'-ers, an eminent English dissenting divine and writer, who was brought up to the printing business, after which he settled in London as a bookseller; but having experienced losses in trade, became pastor to a congregation of dissenters. In 1779, he received his degree of LL.D. from Edinburgh. His principal productions were, "British Biography;" "Observations on Hume's History of England;" "The Life and Reign of Frederick III. of Prussia;" "A Vindication of Locke;" several sermons and political tracts. He was also a coadjutor with Dr. Kippis in compiling the new edition of the "Biographia Britannica." B. in London, 1737; D. in the same city, 1799.

TOWNSLEY, Rev. James, toun'-le, an English divine, who, in 1759, became head master of Merchant Taylors School. He published some sermons; but is best known as having assisted Hogarth in writing "The Analysis of Beauty," and as the author of the farce entitled "High Life below Stairs." He was the friend of Garrick, who presented him to the living of Hendon. Another farce by him, called "The False Concord," was used as the source for both dialogue and character of "The Clandestine Marriage," by Colman and Garrick. B. in London, 1715; D. 1778.

TOWNSLEY, Charles, an eminent English antiquary and collector. Enjoying an ample fortune, he devoted himself to the forming of a museum of antique statues, marbles, coins, and manuscripts. His house in Park Street, Westminster, was almost entirely filled with fragments of Egyptian architecture, intermixed with some of the most beautiful specimens of Greek and Roman art. His collection of ancient medals was extremely valuable, and among his manuscripts was one of Homer. His Etruscan Antiquities were described in a work by D'Hancarville. He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and a trustee of the British Museum, in which institution his collection was placed. B. 1737; D. in London, 1805.

TOWNSEND, John, toun'-end, founder of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, London, became minister of an Independent congregation at Kingston, in Surrey, whence, in 1784, he removed to Bermondsey, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life. With the assistance of the Rev. H. C. Mason, parochial minister of Bermondsey, he in 1792 founded the institution for the deaf and dumb children of indigent parents; which excellent charity obtained such efficient patronage that, in 1807, an edifice, since much enlarged, was erected under the auspices of the late duke of Gloucester. Mr. Townsend also actively assisted in the formation of the Missionary Society, the Female Penitentiary, and other religious and charitable associations; besides instituting a school for the gratuitous education of the children of necessitous dissenting ministers. He was a coadjutor with the Rev. Mr. Mason in his "Family Bible" and was the author of "Hints on Sunday Schools and Itinerant Preaching," "Nine Discourses on Prayer," &c. B. 1757; D. 1826.

TOWNSHEND, Charles, Viscount, an English statesman, who, in the reign of Queen Anne, was appointed, with the duke of Marlborough, to negotiate the peace of Gertruydenberg, and, soon afterwards, was sent as ambassador to the States-general of the United Provinces. Upon the accession of George I., in 1714, he became prime minister; but in the course of the subsequent years his influence with the king rapidly declined, principally through his having resisted the avaricious designs of the monarch's

German favourites and mistresses. He was removed from the premiership; but after some time, consented to accept the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, a post he retained for but a short period. He held various offices during the seven subsequent years; but was being continually involved in disputes with the German coterie, and, indeed, with his brother ministers. When George II. became king, in 1727, Townshend was eclipsed by Sir Robert Walpole, who had acquired great influence with the new monarch. Before his triumphant rival, he retired from office, and, repairing to his estate at Rainham, in Norfolk, spent the remaining years of his life in agricultural pursuits. "He left office," says Lord Mahon, "with a most unblemished character, and, what is still less common, a most patriotic moderation." B. 1676; D. 1733.

TOWNSHEND, Charles, an English statesman, who was the grandson of the preceding, commenced public life in 1747, as a member of the House of Commons, and, after distinguishing himself as a debater, was in 1754 appointed a lord of the Admiralty. He subsequently acted in succession as secretary-at-war, first lord of trade and of plantations, paymaster of the forces, and, under the administration of Chatham, chancellor of the exchequer, in which office he, during the illness of his great chief, who was opposed to American taxation, imposed duties upon glass, tea, and other articles, which caused the colonists to rise in rebellion, and led ultimately to the separation of America from the mother country. He was on the point of attaining to the premiership of a new ministry, when he was carried off by a fever. Burke, in his celebrated speech upon American taxation, spoke of Townshend as "the delight and ornament of this House, and the charm of every private society which he honoured with his presence. Perhaps there never arose in this country, nor in any country, a man of a more pointed and finished wit, and when his passions were not concerned, of a more refined, exquisite, and penetrating judgment." B. 1725; D. 1797.

TOWNSON, Thomas, tou'-son, a learned English divine, who obtained a fellowship at Magdalen College, and subsequently became archdeacon of Richmond, in Yorkshire. His most important work was "Discourses on the Four Gospels," which was subsequently translated into German. B. in Essex, 1715; D. 1792.

TOZZETTI, John Targioni, tot-sait'-te, an Italian botanist, who became keeper of the botanical garden at Florence, and wrote several works in Latin and some in Italian. His first was a thesis upon the "Utility of Plants in the Practice of Physic;" the others were chiefly connected with his profession. B. at Florence, 1712; D. at the same city, 1733.

TRADESCANT, John, trad'-es-kant, an eminent naturalist, who is supposed to have been a Dutchman. He settled in England about the beginning of the reign of James I. Both himself and his son were great travellers, and the father is said to have gone through Europe, Turkey, Greece, Egypt, and Barbary. His son, also named John, collected a cabinet of curiosities, of which an account was printed, called "Museum Tradescantium." In 1629 he was appointed gardener to Charles I., and had a very large garden at Lambeth, well stocked with rare plants. D. 1633. His son died 1663.

TRAILL, Thomas Stewart, trail, a distinguished physician, professor, and scientific inquirer, was a native of Kirkwall, where his father was parish minister, and studied at the university of Edinburgh with Brougham and that now famous set. He took his degree of M. D. in 1801, and in 1803 settled in Liverpool as a general practitioner. In 1832 he was appointed professor of medical jurisprudence in the university of Edinburgh, and gave his first course in 1833. During his nearly forty years' professoriate, he was never absent from his lectures until 1861. Dr. Traill, in the midst of his medical duties, had zealously kept up his general scientific culture, and was always learning. He lectured frequently on chemistry and natural history in Liverpool, and in Edinburgh supplied the chairs of both these classes when vacant. In 1852 he undertook the editorship of the eighth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," for which duty his multifarious and minute knowledge of the entire round of physical science peculiarly fitted him. Besides his own specific subject—forensic medicine—Dr. Traill devoted himself in early life strenuously to the then new studies of physical geography and meteorology; and there was not any outlying corner of phenomenal knowledge of which he had not some recondite and exact note. He was not a philosopher, neither was he strictly scientific; but was a sort of middleman who gathered other men's knowledge, and distributed it, standing between them and the public. In a word, he was a walking encyclopædia—an ample dictionary of the facts of the material world, and, as such, was a most remarkable man. B. 1781; D. 1862.

TRAJAN, M. Ulpius Crinitus, trai'-jân, a Roman emperor, who in early life served under Vespasian and Titus against the Jews; and in 97 was adopted by Nerva, and named as his successor in the empire, of which he became sole sovereign in the following year. His reign was popular, and he gained splendid victories over the Dacians, Persians, and other powers; but he disgraced his great qualities by a rigorous persecution of the Christians. By his directions, Apollodorus, the architect, erected the famous pillar at Rome still called by his name. B. near Seville, Spain, about 52; D. at Selinus, in Cilicia, 117.

TRALLIANUS, Alexander, trâl'-li-ai'-nus, a medical writer, who was a native of Tralles, in Lydia, and is said to have been the first who practised phlebotomy and used cantharides as a blister for the gout. His works have been printed at Bâle, Paris, and London. Flourished about 550.

TRAPP, Joseph, trap, an eminent divine, became, in 1773, rector of Harlington, in Middlesex, and in 1774, one of the lecturers at St. Martin's in the Fields. He produced, "Prælectiones Poeticæ;" a Latin translation of "Paradise Lost;" four volumes of Sermons; several political pamphlets; a translation of the works of Virgil into blank verse, &c. B. at Cherrington, Gloucestershire, 1679; D. 1747.

TRAVERSARI, Ambrogio, trai'-vai'-ad'-re, a learned Italian monk, who acted as interpreter between the Italians and Greeks when the emperor Palæologus and the patriarch of Constantinople visited Italy. His translation of Diogenes Laërtius, inscribed to Cosmo de' Medici, has been several times printed. B. near Forlì, 1386; D. at Florence, 1430.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Tredgold

TREDGOLD, Thomas, tred'-gold, an industrious English writer upon mechanics, was born in humble circumstances, and brought up to the trade of a cabinet-maker, at which he worked until about his 25th year, when he repaired to London, and was taken into the office of his uncle, an architect. After diligently pursuing his studies in architecture and engineering, he commenced writing articles for the scientific publications, and for the "Encyclopædia Britannica." He produced his important work, "The Elementary Principles of Carpentry," in 1820. The "Account of the Invention and Progressive Improvement of the Steam-engine" was published in 1827. A practical treatise on Railroads and Carriages, and other valuable works, likewise emanated from him. b. near Durham, 1738; d. 1820.

TREDIAKOVSKY, Vassili Kirilowitch, tred'-i-akow'-ske, an eminent Russian poet, who visited France and England, and upon his return to St. Petersburg was appointed secretary of the Academy of Sciences and professor of eloquence. He composed tragedies, fables, and epics, and produced a paraphrase of Fénelon's "Telemaachus;" but the work was so dull that Catherine II. was in the habit of causing those who transgressed the rules laid down for the regulation of her private retreat, the Hermitage, to get a hundred lines of the poem by heart as a penalty. He was an example of the greatest literary industry. Once, having made a translation of Rollin's "Ancient History," in twenty-six volumes, the MS. was destroyed by fire; upon which Trediakovsky set to work, and again went through the whole task. b. 1703; d. 1769.

TRENCH, Richard Chenevix, D.D., trench, a modern English philologist, who, after completing his studies at the university of Cambridge, entered into orders, and became a country curate. His earliest efforts in literature were as a poet, in imitation of the chaste style of Wordsworth. After obtaining some preferment in the church, he became in 1848 a select preacher at the university of Cambridge, and after the death of Dr. Buckland, in 1856, was appointed dean of Westminster. In 1864 he succeeded Dr. Whately as archbishop of Dublin. His most important works were, "Notes on the Miracles," "Proverbs and their Lessons," "Synonyms of the New Testament," and "The Study of Words." b. 1807.

TRENCHARD, Sir John, trench'-ard, an English statesman, who, after completing his education at Oxford, studied the law, and was called to the bar. He was elected a member of the third Parliament of Charles II., in 1670, and distinguished himself as an energetic opponent to the measures of the court party. In 1683 he was arrested on the charge of complicity in the plot for which Sidney and Lord Russell were executed; but ultimately obtained his discharge for want of witnesses against him. He was a party to the invasion of the duke of Monmouth, and in consequence was obliged to seek safety by a flight to France, where he remained until after the Revolution of 1688. After the accession of William III., he was knighted, made chief-justice of Chester, and finally became secretary of state. Wood describes him as "a man of turbulent and aspiring spirit." b. 1650; d. 1695.

TRENCHARD, John, an English political writer, who was educated for the law, which he never followed, but became member of Parliament for Taunton. He wrote, in conjunction with Gordon, "Cato's Letters," "The Independent Whig," "A Natural History of Superstition," "Reflections on the Old Whig," and other works. b. 1662; d. 1723.

TREXCK, Baron Franz von, trenk, was the son of a general in the service of Austria, by whose side he fought at the battle of Melazio, when only in his eleventh year. Of great physical strength and violence of temper, he murdered a farmer, for which he was sent to Russia, where he displayed great courage in war, but also the most brutal ferocity. He afterwards entered the service of Maria Theresa of Austria, and was engaged against the troops of Frederick the Great. His insubordinate conduct, however, caused his being brought to trial by court-martial. Sentenced to be imprisoned, he was confined at Vienna during a year; at the end of which time he contrived to effect his escape in a most extraordinary manner by being carried out of his prison in a coffin. He was retaken in the Netherlands, and imprisoned once more at Gratz, where he poisoned himself soon afterwards. b. in Calabria, 1711; d. 1747.

TREXCK, Francis, Baron von, a Prussian officer, and cousin of the preceding, against whom he served. Having given offence to the government of his country, he was sent to prison, where he endured great hardships for a long time. He at last effected his escape, and was in France at the time of the Revolution, where he was arrested and condemned to the scaffold by the revolutionary tribunal, in 1794. He published his "Memoirs" in 1787.

TREVISO, Edouard Adolphe Mortier, Duke of, and marshal of France, trai'-ve'-so, entered the army of the French republic as a volunteer in 1791, and served with distinction in the subsequent battles. He took Hanover in 1803, and was created marshal of the empire in the following year. In 1806 he entered Hamburg, and subsequently passed into the army of Spain, where he retained his reputation as a brave and skilful general. In the expedition to Russia, he exerted himself to save the remnants of the grand army; and in 1814 was the coadjutor of Marmont in the command of Paris. At the first Restoration he became an adherent of the Bourbons, and was created a peer of France; but after the return of Napoleon from Elba he rejoined his standard. In 1815 he refused to sit in judgment upon Marshal Ney, and was in consequence degraded from his rank as a peer. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies during the interval between 1816 and 1819, and was restored to his titles at the latter date. In 1834 he was appointed minister of war, and held office until he was killed by the king's side by the explosion of Fieschi's infernal machine, in 1835. b. at Cateau, 1768.

TREVOR, Sir John, tre'-vor, an English statesman, who was knighted and appointed secretary of state by Charles II., a post he retained until his death. He would appear to have been an honest man; it is certain that he was opposed to the French policy of the king. b. 1626; d. 1673.

TRIBONIAN, tri-bo'-ni-an, a celebrated Roman lawyer, was born about the beginning of the 6th century, at Sida, in Pamphylia; obtained reputation at the bar; and rose, through a succession of offices, to those of prætorian prefect and consul. The emperor Justinian intrusted to him the superintendence of his new code of laws, the result of which was the celebrated Digest and Pandects, which would have transmitted his name with honour to posterity, had not his rapacity and venality been at least equal to his talents. b. 1545.

TRIMMER, Sarah, trim'-mer, a literary lady, the daughter of Joshua Kirby, who wrote on "Perspective," was early initiated in classical as well as in English literature, and wrote a variety of works intended to promote the diffusion of education. b. 1741; d. 1810.

TRISSINO, George, tres-ee'-no, an Italian poet, who was employed by Leo X. upon various missions to Denmark, Venice, and Germany, and afterwards by Clement VII. He was the author of a poem entitled "Italy delivered from the Goths;" a tragedy called "Sophonisba;" a comedy, and a large number of smaller pieces. Voltaire borrowed from and imitated him. b. 1478; d. 1550.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, tro'-gus, a Roman historian, who wrote a "Universal History" from the reign of Ninus, king of Assyria, to the time of Augustus, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance. It was epitomized by Justin; but the original work has been lost. Flourished in the last century b.c.

TROLLOPE, Mrs. Frances, tro'-lop, a modern English novelist, who was the wife of Anthony Trollope, Esq., barrister-at-law, with whom she resided upon the continent. After the death of her husband, she visited the United States, and resided there during three years. She commenced her career as an authoress by producing a work entitled "Domestic Life of the Americans," which appeared in 1832. This work, which excited an extraordinary amount of criticism upon both sides of the Atlantic, was followed by "Belgium and Western Germany;" "Paris and the Parisians;" "The Vicar of Wrexhill;" "Vienna and the Austrians, with some Account of a Journey through Swabia, Bavaria, the Tyrol, and the Saltzbourg;" "The Widow Barnaby;" "The Blue Bellies of England;" "The Barnabys in America; or, the Widow Married;" "The Lauringtons; or, Superior People;" "Town and Country;" "The Life and Adventures of a Clever Woman;" and, indeed, scores of others, which constituted their authoress the most prolific writer of her day. b. 1790; d. 1863.

TROLLOPE, Thomas Adolphus, a modern English miscellaneous writer, son of the preceding, with whom he resided at Florence. He commenced as an author in 1840, at which date he put forth a work entitled "A Summer in Brittany." He next published "A Summer in Western France," which was followed by "Impressions of a Wanderer in Italy, Switzerland, France, and Germany." Improving with each successive effort, his later works presented considerable attractions, both in style and subject. The most popular of these were, "The Girlhood of Catherine de' Medici," "A Decade of Italian Women," and a "Life of Filippo Strozzi." b. 1810.

TROLLOPE, Anthony, an eminent novelist, son of Mrs. F. Trollope, and one of the most popular as well as prolific writers of his day, produced several excellent transcripts of modern society; such as "Dr. Thorne," "The Three Clerks," "The Bertrams," "Framley Parsonage," "Orley Farm," "The Small House at Allington," &c. He also, in 1862, published a work on America, being the result of his observations while on a tour in that country. His last story is the "Vicar of Bullhampton." b. 1815.

TROMP, Martin Harpertzoon, tromp, a celebrated Dutch admiral, who rose from the lowest station to the supreme command, wholly by merit. In 1639 he defeated a numerous Spanish fleet, and afterwards gained several other victories, principally over an English fleet under Blake, in 1652, after which he cruised in the Channel with a broom at the masthead of his ship. In the following year, the Dutch and English fleets, under Tromp and Blake, fought a desperate battle in the Channel, but without either side gaining the advantage. Blake falling ill, the command of the English vessels devolved upon Monk, who encountered Tromp off the Dutch coast. After a stubborn fight, the English claimed the victory, and in the engagement Tromp was killed. b. 1597; killed, 1653.

TROMP, Cornelius van, a celebrated Dutch admiral, and second son of the preceding. In his twenty-first year he was placed in command of a vessel, with which he served under Dewildt in an expedition against the emperor of Morocco in 1650. After distinguishing himself in the Mediterranean, and with the English fleet off Leghorn, he was appointed a rear-admiral. Subsequently to some years of repose, he was dispatched against the Algerine cruisers, whom he severely handled. The war between England and Holland was renewed in 1665, and in that year he served in the action in which the English fleet, under the duke of York, defeated Van Opdam. In the following year he served under Ruyter in an engagement in which the English were defeated. An action in which the Dutch were beaten soon followed, and Ruyter attributing his misfortunes to Van Tromp, the latter was arrested; but was restored to his rank by the Stadtholder, afterwards William III., in 1673. In this year the English and French fleets fought as allies against the Dutch. In 1675 he went to England, where he was created a baron by Charles II. He next served against the Swedes as the ally of the king of Denmark, who, to reward his services, raised him to the rank of count. At the death of Ruyter, he was named admiral-general of the United Provinces, and, after distinguishing himself under the Prince of Orange in the expedition against Saint Omer, retired into private life. b. at Rotterdam, 1629; d. at Amsterdam, 1691.

TROUSCHET, Theodore, tron'-shet, an eminent Swiss physician, who was the favourite pupil of Boerhaave. He settled at Amsterdam as physician, and afterwards at Geneva. In 1756 he removed to Paris, where he attended the royal family, and became the first inoculator of his time. His most important works are—several articles in the "Encyclopédie;" a treatise "De Nympha;" and "Observations on Ophthalmia and Ilierna." b. at Geneva, 1709; d. at Paris, 1781.

TROUSCHET, Jean Robert, an eminent Swiss juriscounsel, who became procureur-general at Geneva, and wrote several works against Rousseau. b. 1711; d. 1793.

TROUSON DE COUDRAX, George Alfred, tron'-sawen(g), a celebrated French advocate, who defended Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI., and was the means of saving many of his countrymen from the guillotine during the Revolution. b. 1750; d. 1798.

TROUGHTON, Edward, trou'-tun, an eminent English astronomical instrument-maker, who succeeded to the business of his uncle and brother, in Fleet Street, London, and in 1826 took Simms, also eminent as a maker of mathematical instruments, into partnership. It was said of him, that "he improved and extended every instrument he touched, and that every astronomical instrument was in its turn the subject of his attention." The greater number of the finest instruments used in the Royal Observatory and other scientific establishments were constructed by him. He was the author of several treatises in the "Philosophical Transactions," &c. B. 1753; D. in London, 1835.

TROWBRIDGE, Sir Thomas, trou'-bridj, an English admiral, who, having entered the royal navy, served under Sir Edward Hughes in the East Indies, and became post-captain in 1782. Returning from an expedition to the China seas, he was captured by the French, but while being conveyed to France in the Sanspareil, that ship was taken by Lord Howe, in the victory of 1794. Trowbridge was placed in command of the ship; and, on removing to the Culloden, of 74 guns, took part in the victory gained by Sir John Jervis off Cape St. Vincent. He was next placed as second in command under Nelson, and, in that capacity, prepared, with the other vessels, to enter the bay of Aboukir; but unfortunately his vessel ran aground, and he was thus prevented from sharing in the great victory of the Nile, a deprivation which almost broke the heart of the gallant sailor. Nelson, his attached friend, nevertheless represented his services to the Admiralty, and he and his officers were placed upon the same footing as those actually engaged. In 1799 he was created a baronet, and subsequently became an admiral, and was dispatched to the East Indies; on his return from which station, in a leaky vessel, he and his crew were lost at sea. B. in London, about 1750; drowned, 1807.

TROWBRIDGE, Sir Thomas St. Vincent Cochran, a gallant English soldier, and grandson of the preceding, who, while serving in the Crimea, distinguished himself by holding, with the greatest bravery, a five-gun battery against the onslaught of the Russians at Inkermann, in which action he lost his right leg and left foot. On his return to England he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and received a pension. B. 1817; D. 1867.

TROX, François de, truar, an eminent French painter, who was the disciple of Nicholas de Loir, and became a professor in the Academy. He painted historical subjects and portraits, and was employed by Louis XIV. B. 1645; D. 1730.

TROX, Jean François de, a French painter, and son of the preceding. Louis XIV. conferred on him the order of St. Michael, and appointed him director of the Academy at Rome. B. at Paris, 1679; D. 1752.

TRUEBA Y COSIO, Telesforo de, trou-ai'-va e ko'-se-o, a Spaniard, who wrote novels and tragedies in the English language. He was educated in England, and, in his twenty-third year, produced his first work, a novel called "Gomez Arias," the action of which was placed in the times of the struggle between the Moors and Spaniards. This work, which obtained an extraordinary share of attention, was followed by other tales, the best of which were, "The Castilian," "Paris and London," and the "Romance of History." In 1832 he produced upon the stage of the Lyceum Theatre, a musical farce entitled "Call again to-morrow." Some comedies, which met with but little success, followed. He was likewise the author of "A History of the Conquest of Peru;" "Life of Hernan Cortes;" both of which were published in Constable's "Miscellany." These works possess considerable merit; but have been totally eclipsed by the greater productions of Prescott. In 1834 he returned to his native country, and became a secretary to the Cortes, and afterwards wrote some plays, which met with success upon the Spanish stage. B. at Santander, 1805; D. at Paris, 1835.

TRUMBULL, Sir William, trum'-bul, an English statesman, who was for some time ambassador to France, and afterwards secretary of state. But he is chiefly known as the early patron and correspondent of Pope, who wrote an epitaph on him. B. in Berkshire, 1686; D. 1716.

TRUMBULL, John, an eminent American painter, who, in early life, fought in the war of independence, and became colonel and aide-de-camp to Washington. Considering himself slighted, he threw up his commission, and in 1780 repaired to England for the purpose of studying painting under his countryman, West. Suspected by the English government, he was arrested, but was liberated on condition of immediately quitting England. He subsequently lived, on two occasions, in London and Paris, and became, after his final return to his native country, president of the American Academy of the Arts. He painted several portraits of Washington, and a series commemorative of the war of independence. Previous to his death, he bequeathed a number of pictures to Yale College, which were placed in a building at New Haven, called the Trumbull Gallery. B. at Lebanon, Connecticut, 1756; D. at New York, 1843.

TRURO, Thomas Wilde, Lord, trou'-ro, a modern English lawyer, who was the son of an attorney, and himself practised as such in the early part of his career. In 1817 he was called to the bar, and speedily rose to a high position in the legal profession. He acted as junior counsel under Lords Denman and Brougham during the trial of Queen Caroline. In 1850 he became Lord Chancellor and Lord Truro. He distinguished himself by the soundness of his judgments and as a legal reformer. His second wife was Mademoiselle Augusta Emma D'Este, daughter of the duke of Sussex. B. 1782; D. 1855.

TRYPHONOBUS, trif-e-od'-or-us, a Greek poet and grammarian, of whom all that remains is a poem on the destruction of Troy, printed at Oxford in 1742, with an English translation by Merrick. Flourished in the 6th century.

TSCHIRNHUSEN, Ehrenfried Walter von, skirn'-hou-sen, an eminent German mathematician, who was of a noble family, and who, while pursuing his studies at the university of Leyden, suddenly left that seat of learning to enter the Dutch army, then engaged against the French. After pursuing a military career during a year and a half, he proceeded to visit England, Italy, and France; but returning home, occupied himself with experimenting upon burning glasses. According to an account furnished to the "Memoirs" of the French Academy in 1699, he constructed a lens three feet in diameter, which was capable of firing wet wood and melting thin iron plates. In 1701, and subsequently, he produced some "Memoirs," in which he endeavoured to prove that the infinitesimal calculus could be dispensed with. In 1686 he published a work entitled "Medicina Corporis," in which he laid down rules for the preservation of health. A companion volume, called "Medicina Mentis," followed; in which he analysed the sources of pleasure and pain in the mind, and treated of the capabilities of that curve line which was subsequently named after him. To him is due the development of the Saxon porcelain-manufacture, he having discovered the method of making porcelain equal to that which is procured from China. B. at Kieslingwald, Upper Lusatia, 1681; D. at his estate in Saxony, 1708.

TSCHUDI, Gilles, shoo'-de, surnamed the Father of Swiss history, was educated under Zuinglius, the reformer, and afterwards rose to the office of landammann, or governor of his native canton. A man of enlightened mind and humane temper, he displayed tact and moderation in the disputes which took place relative to religious opinions. He wrote many works upon the history and topography of Switzerland, most of which still remain in manuscript. Of his printed productions the most important was a chronicle which narrated the history of Switzerland from 1000 to 1470. B. at Glarus, 1505; D. 1572.

TUCKER, Abraham, tuk'-er, a celebrated English metaphysical writer, who was a gentleman of good fortune in Surrey, and devoted his life to the study of the philosophy of mind and morals. He published a curious work, called "The Light of Nature Pursued," under the assumed name of Search; and also, "Man in Quest of Himself," which was reprinted in Paris; and Mathematical Tracts. He has been styled "the metaphysical Montaigne." B. 1705 D. 1774.

TUCKER, Josiah, a celebrated English divine, became D.D. of the university of Oxford in 1759, and on entering into orders, settled at Bristol becoming rector of St. Stephen's and prebendary of the cathedral in that city. In 1756 he was preferred to the deanery of Gloucester. He was an able writer on commercial, political, and theological subjects. At the beginning of the American war he advocated the granting independence to the colonies, for which he was greatly censured by many writers. His principal work is a treatise on Civil Government, against Locke. B. at Langharne, Carmarthen-shire, 1711; D. at Gloucester, 1799.

TUDOR, Owen. (See OWAIN.)

TUDWAT, Thomas, an English musical composer, who became organist and composer extraordinary to Queen Anne. He produced some anthems, &c. Lived between 1650 and 1750.

TULL, Jethro, tull, a gentleman of Oxfordshire, who greatly improved agriculture, and wrote a "Treatise on Horse-hoeing Husbandry," but ruined himself by his experiments. B. about 1680; D. 1740.

TULLIA, tul'-li-a, a daughter of Servius Tullius, king of Rome, married Tarquin the Proud after she had murdered her first husband Aruns, and consented to see Tullius assassinated that Tarquin might be raised to the throne. It is said that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown into the streets of Rome. She was afterwards banished from Rome, with her husband.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS, tul'-lus, third king of Rome, who, according to the historian Livy, succeeded Numa Pompilius. He destroyed the town of Alba, and carried its inhabitants to Rome; he was also successful against the Latins. D. 641 B.C.

TULLY, Thomas, tul'-le, a learned English divine, who became fellow and tutor of Queen's College, Oxford. In 1657 he was appointed principal of St. Edmund Hall, and, after the Restoration, was created D.D., and made chaplain to the king. He wrote "Logica Apodeictica," "Præcipuum Theologicum," and several controversial pieces against Dr. Bull and Mr. Baxter on Justification. B. at Carlisle, 1620; D. 1678.

TULLY, George, a learned English divine, who wrote a "Discourse on the Government of the Thoughts," several sermons and tracts against Popery; and translated part of Plutarch's "Morals," the "Life of Miltiades" from the Latin of Cornelius Nepos, and the "Life of Julius Caesar" from Suetonius. B. 1653; D. 1695.

TUNSTALL, James, tun'-stal, a learned English divine, who, in 1757, was appointed to the living of Rochdale in Lancashire. He wrote "Discourses upon Natural and Revealed Religion," and other works. B. about 1710; D. 1772.

TUPPER, Martin Farquhar, tup'-per, a modern English writer, who, after studying at the Charterhouse and Christchurch, Oxford, entered upon the study of the law. In 1829 he produced the well-known work entitled "Proverbial Philosophy," which passed through upwards of thirty editions. His subsequent works were, "A Crock of Gold," "A Modern Pyramid," "Ballads for the Time on White Slavery," "American Ballads," "Paterfamilias's Diary of Everybody's Tour," a translation of the Poems of King Alfred from the Anglo-Saxon, &c. The "Proverbial Philosophy" has been attacked by the best English critical writers, and been pronounced, notwithstanding its success, to be as heavy, inflated, and dull a piece of literary workmanship as ever crept into notoriety or secured the patronage of the multitude. B. in London, 1810.

TURENNE, Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount de, toor'-ren, a celebrated French general, was the second son of the due de Bouillon and Elizabeth of Nassau, daughter of William I. of Nassau, Prince of Orange. Educated in the Calvinistic faith, he acquired the art of war under Prince Maurice and his brother Prince Henry Frederick, his maternal uncles, in Holland. In 1630 he was sent as a hostage to the court of France. After several gallant actions against the Spaniards in the Low Countries, he took Brisac in 1638, for which Richelieu offered him his niece in marriage; but Turenne, as a Protestant, declined the honour. The next year he served in Italy, and afterwards signalled himself by the conquest of Roussillon. At the age of 23 he became field-marshal, and in 1643 was appointed marshal of France. About this time he was sent to Germany, where he gained several victories; but was defeated in 1645 at Marienthal. He soon after repaired this loss by the victory of Nordlingen, and the same year re-established the elector of Trèves in his territories. In 1647 he effected the famous junction with the Swedish army, and obliged the duke of Bavaria to sue for peace. That prince having violated the treaty, Turenne defeated him in the battle of Amulhausen, and drove him from his dominions. In the civil wars of France he acted at first against the king; but in 1651 was reconciled with the court, became general of the royal army, and was opposed to the Prince of Condé, whom he defeated. In 1658 he took Dunkirk, in conjunction with the English troops. This was followed by the capture of several places in the Netherlands, which produced peace between France and Spain in 1659. Hostilities being renewed in 1667, he was appointed marshal of all the armies, and had the honour of instructing Louis XIV. in the art of war. About this time he renounced the Protestant religion. In 1674 he conquered Franche-Comté, which occasioned a league between the German states against France. To prevent their junction, Turenne attacked the army commanded by the duke of Lorraine, and gained a splendid victory. He afterwards defeated the Imperialists at Mulhausen, and again at Turckheim. Montecuculi was then sent against him, and while the two armies were in view of each other, and preparing for battle, Turenne was killed by a cannon-ball at Sasbach, in 1675, his army crying out, "Our father is dead." He left his "Mémoires," which were published in 1782. B. at Sedan, 1611.

TURGOT, Anne Robert Jacques, four-go, a French statesman, who was educated for the ecclesiastical state in the college of the Sorbonne, after which he applied to the study of the law, and was in 1761 appointed intendant of Limoges. He was next named comptroller-general of the finances, in which office he evinced great talents, by endeavouring to effect a reform in the public expenditure, and by introducing several important regulations for the revival and encouragement of trade. He was at the head of the society called Economists, after the death of Quesnay. He was the author of a number of works upon politics, political economy, metaphysics, and literature, as well as some articles for the "Encyclopædia." B. at Paris, 1727; D. 1781.

TURNEBUS, Adrian, turn-ne-bus, a learned French professor, whose French name was Tournæbus, which some writers maintain was a translation of Turnbull; further declaring him to have been the son of a Scotchman settled in Normandy. He became professor of Greek at Paris, and superintendent of the royal press for works in that language. He wrote notes on Cicero, Varro, Thucydides, and Plato; pieces against Ramus; translations from Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plutarch, Plato, &c.; and Latin poems. But the most important of his works is his "Adversaria." B. at Les Andelys, Normandy, 1512; D. at Paris, 1565.

TURNER, William, turn-ner, an eminent English physician and divine, who became a preacher, and travelled over the kingdom to propagate the Protestant doctrines, for which Bishop Gardiner sent him to prison. On his release, he went abroad, and took his doctor's degree at Ferrara. At the accession of Edward VI. he returned, and was made dean of Wells. When Mary came to the throne, he went into exile, and did not return till after her death. Queen Elizabeth restored him to his preferments. He wrote a treatise on the Baths of England and Germany; "A Complete Herbal, or History of Plants;" "Historia de Naturis Herbarum;" and some other botanical works. B. at Morpeth, Northumberland, 1520; D. 1568.

TURNER, Thomas, a pious English divine, who became fellow of St. John's College, Oxford,

In 1629 he obtained a canon residentiaryship in St. Paul's Cathedral, and was appointed chaplain to Charles I., whom he accompanied to Scotland. In 1641 he was made dean of Rochester, and soon after dean of Canterbury, of which he was deprived at the Revolution. He recovered his preferments at the Restoration. B. 1591; D. 1672.

TURNER, Francis, an English prelate, and son of the preceding, became prebendary of St. Paul's, dean of Windsor, and in 1633 bishop of Rochester; whence, the year following, he was translated to Ely. He was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower by James II., and was deprived at the Revolution, for refusing the oaths. He was the author of some sermons, pious poems, and the "Life of Mr. Nicholas Ferrar." D. 1700.

TURNER, Edward, an eminent modern Scotch chemist, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his M.D. degree there. At the establishment of the London University, in 1828, he was nominated professor of chemistry at the new seat of learning. He wrote a valuable work, called "The Elements of Chemistry," and contributed some articles upon mineralogy to the "Penny Cyclopædia." Much esteemed by his pupils, they, after his death, subscribed for a marble bust to commemorate his worth. This memorial was placed in the library of the college. B. in Scotland, 1798; D. 1839.

TURNER, Sharon, an English historical writer, who practised as an attorney in London; but, from an early period of his life, devoted his leisure to historical researches. In 1799 he produced the first volume of his "History of the Anglo-Saxons;" in which work, the most valuable of all his publications, he set the example to historians of finding materials in the valuable records written in the Anglo-Saxon tongue. Encouraged by the success of this work, he made a continuation of it, and completed his history from the earliest period down to the death of Queen Elizabeth. He retired from business in 1829, and in his retreat wrote "Sacred History of the World, as displayed in the Creation and subsequent Events to the Deluge;" "Sacred Meditations of a Layman;" "Richard III.," a poem; and several articles for the "Quarterly Review." B. in London, 1768; D. in the same city, 1847.

TURNER, Joseph Mallord William, a celebrated English landscape painter, was the son of a barber in London. In early youth he evinced the strongest inclination for pictorial art, and so successfully did he labour in his vocation, that even in his thirtieth year, he was acknowledged as the first of living English landscape painters. At that period, 1805, it was written of him: "Turner may be considered as a striking instance of how much may be gained by industry, if accompanied by perseverance, even without the assistance of a master. The way he acquired his professional powers was by borrowing where he could a drawing or a picture to copy, or by making a sketch of any one in the Exhibition early in the morning, and finishing it up at home. By such practices, and by patient perseverance, he has overcome all the difficulties of the art." He exhibited his first picture at the Royal Academy in 1787, in his twelfth year; and from this period until his death, he sent, besides others to the British Institution, 259 pictures to the same place. Many of these works were of the most ambitious character; and included in the list were some reproductions of nature of marvellous skill and beauty. In 1789 he was elected associate, and three years afterwards, academican. In 1807 he was appointed professor of perspective Delighting in measuring his strength against the great master of landscape-painting, Claude, he, in 1808, began a series of sketches in professed rivalry with him, entitled "Liber Studiorum." Many celebrated engravings were executed from his designs, the principal being, "Scenery of the Southern Coast;" illustrations to Rogers's "Italy," and to the poems of Byron; "Rivers of England," "Rivers of France," and "The Shipwreck." Ever progressing, he commenced by imitating Gainsborough, Wilson, and other English painters; afterwards followed Claude and Gaspar Poussin; till, finally, he threw off all signs of pupillage, and appeared as a bold, original, and unrivalled painter and colourist. Ruskin, his most enthusiastic admirer, speaking of these changes of manner, says: "There has been a marked and constant progress in his mind; he has not been like some few artists, without childhood; his course of study has been as evidently as it has been swiftly progressive; and in different stages of the struggle, sometimes one order of truth, sometimes another, has been aimed at or omitted. As he advanced, the previous knowledge or attainment was absorbed in what succeeded, or abandoned only if incompatible, and never abandoned without a gain; and his last works present the sum and perfection of his accumulated knowledge, delivered with the impatience and passion of one who feels too much and knows too much, and has too little time to say it in, to pause for expression, or ponder over his syllables." Of a reserved and unsocial disposition, he stood aloof from artistic and other society, and, during his lifetime, it used to be said that he was absorbed with a love of money. After his decease, however, it was found that he had bequeathed the whole of his pictures and drawings to the nation, and, as he had been in the habit of repurchasing the best of his earliest works as they came to be offered for sale, and had, moreover, refused, for years before his death, to part with his finest productions, the gift was indeed a munificent one. His funded property he left to be applied to the purpose of founding an asylum for decayed artists at Twickenham. The will having been, unfortunately, informal in several respects, a chancery suit was the result; but the matter was compromised by his next of kin taking the engravings and other property; one hundred of his finest oil paintings, and several hundreds of drawings and sketches, becoming the property of the nation. These last were arranged for exhibition by Mr. Ruskin, and, together with his pictures, they may be viewed at the Gallery of British Art, in the South Kensington Museum. Turner died in an obscure lodging on the banks of the Thames, at Chelsea, where he had for a short time resided under an assumed name. His remains lie in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, near the ashes of Reynolds, Wilkie, and other great luminaries of the English school of pictorial art. B. in London, 1775; D. at Chelsea, 1851.

TURNER, Thomas Hudson, a modern English writer upon antiquities, who was brought up to the trade of a printer, but was subsequently was afterwards appointed secretary to the Archæological Institute. His most important works were, "Some Account of Domestic Architecture in England," "Early Household Expenses," and a number of papers contributed to the "Journal" of the Society of Archæologists and that of the Society of Antiquaries at Newcastle. He likewise assisted Mr. Tyrrell, remembrancer of London, in collecting materials for a history of the English metropolis. B. in London, 1815; D. 1852.

TURNER, or TILPIN (Latin TURNIPUS), teor. p. a French monk of the Benedictine order, who gained the favour of Charlemagne, and was by him made archbishop of Rheims in 773. He is held by some writers to have been the author of a poetical romance in Latin, founded upon the expedition of Charlemagne against the Moors in Spain. Flourished at the end of the 8th century.

TURNER DE CRISSE, Lancelot, a French writer upon military science, who, at an early age, entered the army, and after signalizing himself in the campaigns in Germany and Italy, attained the grade of brigadier-general. About 1753 he quitted the army, and after remaining for a short time in the abbey of La Trappe, entered in 1754 upon a literary career, with the publication of a work entitled "Literary and Philosophical Amusements of Two Friends." His most important work, "An Essay on the Art of War," was put forth shortly afterwards, and attracting considerable attention amongst military men, was translated into English, and, by order of Frederick the Great, into German. In 1757 he resumed his profession as a soldier, and after becoming lieutenant-general, was, in 1781, appointed governor of Fort Scarpe, in Douay. He subsequently produced "Commentaries upon the Institutions of Vegetius," and "Notes on Cæsar," which were founded upon Clarke and Wailly. At the outbreak of the French Revolution he retired to Germany, where he is supposed to have died; but the date is unknown. B. in La Beauce, about 1715.

TUSSEN, Thomas, tus-ser, an English writer, who produced, in verse, a treatise upon agriculture, entitled "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry." It is a curious picture of the agriculture of his time. D. about 1580.

TWNING, Thomas, twi-ning, a learned English divine, rector of St. Mary's, Chichester. He published a translation of the "Poetics" of Aristotle. B. 1734; D. at Chichester, 1804.

TWYNNE, William, an English surgeon, who served with the British army in different parts of the world, and in 1830 became surgeon to the civil hospital at Calcutta. He was the author of a work upon the diseases of Bengal, which is of great authority. D. at Calcutta, 1835.

TWISS, William, twiss, an English Presbyterian divine, who was president of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and was made rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn. He wrote a number of works upon religious matters, strongly Calvinistic in tone. p. 1645.

Twiss, Richard, an English traveller, who was a man of fortune, and spent several years in visiting various parts of the Continent. He produced, among other works, "Travels through Spain and Portugal;" "A Tour in Ireland;" "A Trip to Paris in 1702;" "Anecdotes of Chess," and "Miscellanies." p. 1747; p. 1821.

Twiss, Horace, a distinguished lawyer and political writer, was the eldest son of Francis Twiss, author of a verbal "Index to Shakspeare," and of Frances, second daughter of Roger Kemble, the father of the illustrious family of the Kembles and of Mrs. Siddons. Called to the bar in 1811, he travelled the Oxford circuit for some years; but subsequently attached himself to the equity courts. His political life commenced in 1820, when he was chosen member for Wootton-Bassett. He represented this borough for ten years, during which he became eminent for his business talents, and his speeches in favour of Catholic emancipation and law reform. He was, in 1823, after being counsel to the Admiralty and judge advocate, appointed under-secretary for the colonies in the duke of Wellington's ministry. He sat for Newport in 1830; but after the passing of the reform bill, which he earnestly opposed, his Parliamentary career was practically closed, for though he represented Bridport from 1835 to 1837, all his subsequent attempts to obtain a seat in Parliament proved abortive. From this period he devoted his talents to the press. He occasionally contributed leading articles to the "Times;" and introduced the practice on the daily journals of giving a summary of the speeches in the Houses of Parliament in addition to the reports. In 1844 he received the appointment of vice-chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. From an early age, Mr. Twiss had been devoted to literary pursuits, and wrote a variety of pieces, chiefly on constitutional subjects; but his literary fame rests chiefly on his "Life of Lord Eldon," one of the best biographies ever written, and a complete repertory of the remarkable political transactions of the era to which it refers. p. 1786; p. 1849.

Tye, Christopher, ti, an English musician, who was admitted to the degree of doctor in music at Cambridge in 1545. Dr. Tye was instructor in music to Edward VI., and organist of the royal chapel in the reign of Elizabeth. He composed a number of anthems. p. in London, and flourished in the 16th century.

Tyres, Thomas, ti'-ers, a miscellaneous writer, who was educated for the legal profession, but never practised. He became proprietor of Vauxhall Gardens, and was greatly esteemed by Dr. Johnson. He wrote "Supposed Conferences between Eminent Characters, political and literary;" and some poems. p. 1787.

TYNDALE, or TINDALE, William, tin'-dal, an eminent English divine, who was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. Having embraced the doctrines of the Reformers, he went to Antwerp, where he printed a translation of the Scriptures in English. This being sent over to London, all the copies were bought up; on which Tyndale revised his work, and printed a larger impression. The work exciting the hatred of the Romish clergy, he was apprehended as a heretic, and burnt near Antwerp, 1536. p. about 1447.

TYRANNIO, ti-ran'-ni-o, a celebrated Greek grammarian, whose real name was Theophrastus, which his pupils altered to Tyrannio, on account of his severity. He was taken prisoner by Lucullus and carried to Rome, where he became intimate with Cicero, who employed him in arranging his library. He himself possessed a large collection of books. Flourished 60 b.c.

TYRCONNEL, Richard Talbot, Duke of, ti-ron'-nel, an Irish nobleman, and zealous Roman Catholic, who was appointed by James II. lord-lieutenant of his native country. He espoused the cause of James II. against William III., and received the king at Dublin after he had fled from England. After the Revolution of 1688, he attempted to render Ireland independent, but signally failed. p. 1691.

TYRBELL, James, ti'-rel, an English historical writer, who, after studying at Queen's College, Oxford, entered at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar about 1668. Possessed of an independent fortune, he was not under the necessity of practising the law, and accordingly devoted himself to the pursuit of historical research. Among his first literary efforts, was a reply to Sir Robert Filmer's treatise on government, under the title of "The Patriarch Unmonarched." Opposed to the government of James II., Tyrbell was one of those who welcomed the Revolution and the accession of William III., which change he championed in a course of "Political Dialogues," which were afterwards republished in a volume entitled "An Enquiry into the Ancient Constitution of the English Government." The publication of his most important work was commenced in 1700; this was called "General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil," a work it was only continued to the close of the reign of Richard II. p. in London, 1642; p. 1718.

TYRTÆUS, ti'-te'-us, a celebrated Greek poet, who distinguished himself by warlike verses to animate the Lacedæmonians in their war with the Messenians; for which he was made a citizen of Sparta. Some fragments by him are to be found in various collections of the Greek poets. Flourished about 680-635 b.c.

TYRWHITT, Thomas, ti'-wit, a learned English writer, who became fellow of Merton College, Oxford. In 1763 he was appointed clerk of the House of Commons. He published an edition of Aristotle's "Poetics;" another of Chaucer, with a life of that poet; notes on Shakspeare, and collected the poems attributed to Rowley, in which controversy he distinguished himself. p. in London, 1730; p. 1786.

TYRSILIO, ti-sil'-yo, a Welsh poet, historian, and divine, who wrote a Chronicle of Britain, from which Geoffrey of Monmouth composed his history. Flourished in the 7th century.

TYSON, Edward, ti'-son, an eminent English physician, who became a fellow of the Royal Society, whose "Transactions" he enriched with many valuable papers. He was appointed physician to the hospitals of Bethlem and Bridewell. The best of his works are, "Phocæna, or the Anatomy of a Porpoise;" "Carigunea, or the Anatomy of an Opossum;" and "Orang Outang, or the Anatomy of a Pigmy compared with that of a Monkey, an Ape, and a Man." p. 1649; p. 1703.

TITLER, William, tit'-ler, an eminent antiquary, who was the editor of "The Poet Remains of James I.," to which he prefixed a dissertation on the literary history of Europe. He also wrote a vindication of Mary Queen of Scots, and a dissertation upon Scottish music. b. at Edinburgh, 1711; d. 1792.

TITLER, Alexander Fraser, called Lord Woodhouselee, a Scotch judge and miscellaneous writer, was the son of the preceding; after studying the law, was admitted as advocate. He became professor of universal history and Roman antiquities in the university of Edinburgh in 1786; but still continuing to practise his profession, he, in 1790, rose to be judge-admiral of Scotland. In 1803 became judge of the Court of Session, with the courtesy title of Lord Woodhouselee. His most important works were, "Elements of General History," an essay on the Principles of Translation; a treatise on Martial Law; and essays contributed to Edinburgh periodicals. b. at Edinburgh, 1747; d. 1813.

TITLER, Patrick Fraser, a Scotch historical writer, who was the son of the preceding. After studying at the university of Edinburgh, and becoming a member of the Faculty of Advocates. he. in 1813, relinquished the law, and frequently to visiting.

MAGNAN, mag'-nan, an eminent French writer, who, in 1789, published a separate work, under the title of "Life of James Crichton of Cluny, commonly called the Mirable Crichton." "The Life of John Wicliffe," and other works, followed. About 1860 he acted upon the suggestion of Sir Walter Scott, and commenced his most important work, "The History of Scotland." This, perhaps the best history of Scotland, commenced with the accession of Alexander III., and ended with the union of the English and Scottish crowns in the person of James I. in 1603. From a large number of other works, we mention of his, "The Lives of the Scottish Worthies," "Life of Henry VIII.," "England under the Reigns of Edward VI. and Mary," "Historical View of the Progress of Discovery on the more Northern Coasts of America," and "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh." For some years before his death, he was in receipt of a pension of £200 per annum from the government. b. at Edinburgh, 1791; d. there, 1849.

TZETZES, John, tez'-sais, an eminent Greek grammarian. He wrote commentaries upon Lycophron, on Homer, Hesiod, and other Greek authors. The best edition of these works that of Müller, Leipzig, 1811. Flourished during the latter half of the 12th century.

U

UBALDINI, Petruccio, oo'-bal-dé-ne, a celebrated illuminator on vellum. There is extant a book illuminated by him, containing the sentences of Scripture, painted by order of Nicholas Bacon, and presented by him to Lady Lumley. Flourished in the 16th century.

UBALDINI, Ruggieri d', archbishop of Pisa and one of the chiefs of the Ghibelline party, was engaged in a struggle with the perfidious Ugolino della Gherardesca, who was his rival for the supreme power at Pisa. Ugolino, together with his family, fell into the power of Ubal dini, who shut them up in a tower, and threw the keys into the Arno, the unfortunate Ugolino perishing of hunger, in 1288. Dante, in his "Inferno," describes Ugolino as exercising cruel vengeance upon his murderer in the infernal regions.

UBERTI, Fazio degli, oo'-bair'-te, an Italian poet, who belonged to the Ghibelline party at Florence. When the Guelphs became triumphant, he left Florence, and passed the remainder of his life at Milan and other Italian courts, where his poetical talents made him a favourite. His principal work was a poem entitled "Il Dittamondo" (News of the World), in which he described the history, geography, and other matters connected with the cities and sovereigns of various Italian principalities. Flourished in the 14th century.

UCCELLO, Paolo, oot'-chai'-lo, an eminent Florentine painter, and the first of the Italian artists who evolved a practical theory of perspective. He excelled in landscapes and in depicting animals. One of his best works was a collection of portraits upon one panel, of Giotto the painter, Brunelleschi the architect, Donatello the sculptor, himself as a master of the art of perspective, and Giovanni Manetti as the first mathematician of his time. b. 1397; d. according to Vasari, 1478.

UDALL, Nicholas, oo'-dal, an English classicist, who studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was, in 1584, appointed master of Eton school. He subsequently became master of Westminster school, and, under Edward VI., held a canonry at Windsor. He produced "Flowers for Latin Speaking," and translations of the comedies of Terence and of the works of Erasmus. b. in Hampshire, 1506; d. 1564.

UFFENBACH, Zacharias Conrad Von, oo'-fen-bak, a learned German writer, who studied the law at the universities of Strasburg and Halle, and, in 1702, took the degree of Doctor of Law. He subsequently travelled in Germany and England, for the purpose of collecting manuscripts and rare books. He afterwards became chief-justice and senator at Frankfort. His most important works were his Autobiography; Catalogues of his Library, one of the most extensive in Germany; and a Select History, Bibliographical and Literary. b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1683; d. 1734.

UGGIONE, or UGLONE MARCO, oog'-lo'-nai, an eminent Italian painter, and the best of the disciples of Leonardo da Vinci, of whose celebrated picture of "The Last Supper" he made a copy. Some of his finest works were executed for the palace at Milan. d. 1530.

UHLAND, Johann Ludwig, oo'-land, an eminent German poet, who produced a learned work on the myth of the northern legend of Thor, ancient High and Low German songs, and various collections of ballads of a patriotic and spirit-stirring character. Of his own poetical compositions, he published only one volume, and that when he was but 23 years of age; and subsequently devoted himself to literary research, and to politics, being a prominent leader of the liberal party. b. at Tübingen, 1787; d. 1862.

ULFILAS, or ULPHILAS, ul'-fi'-las, bishop of the Goths residing between the Danube and Mount Hæmus, made a translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Gothic language. Of the library of the university of Upsal, and the other in the library at Wolfenbützel. The Upsal volume bears the name of the "Codex Argenteus," on account of its solid silver binding. Of both, several editions have been published; and, as the earliest known example of a Teutonic language, it is highly esteemed by philologists. The Gothic name of this bishop is supposed to have been Vulfila (Wolffing). b. about 318; d. at Constantinope, 383.

ULLOA Y PEREIRA, Louis de, ool-lo'-e e pai-ree'-ra, a Spanish poet, who gained great reputation by his sonnets in the reign of Philip IV., and was, by Count de Olivarez, appointed governor of Leon. d. 1660.

ULLOA, Don Antonio, an eminent Spanish mathematician, who was, in 1735, appointed one of the mathematicians employed in measuring a degree of the meridian at the equator. On his return he was taken prisoner by the English, but was soon afterwards released. He published an account of his voyages, and a work upon the "Natural History and Antiquities of America," &c. He subsequently distinguished himself in promoting the establishment of a cabinet of natural history, a laboratory, the Observatory at Cadiz, and in making improvements in the manufactures of his native country. b. 1716; d. 1795.

ULPIANUS, Domitius, ul-pi-ai'-nus, a celebrated Roman juriconsult, was minister of state to the emperor Alexander Severus, who elevated him to the praetorship. Some fragments of his works are extant. His severe exercise of justice led to his being murdered under the emperor's eyes by the praetorian soldiers in 212.

ULUG-BEG. (See OULOU-BEG.)

ULGER, Johann Friedrich Gottlieb, oon'-ger, an eminent German printer and wood-engraver, who introduced an improved form of German types, which were called after his name. He likewise greatly advanced the art of wood-engraving, and was, in the year 1800, appointed professor of the Academy of Arts at Berlin. As a publisher, he produced a number of excellent works. b. at Berlin, 1750; d. 1804.

ULGER, Frederica Helen, an eminent German authoress, who was the wife of the preceding, executed a number of excellent translations from the French and English languages, and produced some original works, the most popular of which were the novels entitled "The History of a Girl at a Boarding-school," "Confessions of a Fair Saint," and "The Young Frenchman and the German Girl." d. 1813.

UNZER, John Augustus, oon-ser, a German physician, and an able writer on medicine and physiology, among whose works are, "A New Doctrine concerning the Movements of the Soul and of the Imagination," "Thoughts on Sleep and Dreams," "On the Sensitive Faculties of Animated Bodies," a "Manual of Medicine," and "The Physiology of Animal Nature." b. at Halle, 1727; d. 1799.

UPTON, James, up'-ton, a learned English divine, who became fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and was afterwards appointed master of the grammar-school at Taunton, in Somersetshire. He published an edition of Ascham's "Schoolmaster," with notes; and another of Aristotle's "Art of Poetry." b. in Cheshire, 1670; d. at Taunton, Somersetshire, 1749.—His son James became prebendary of Rochester. His works are, an edition of Epictetus; another of Spenser's "Faerie Queene;" and "Observations on Shakspeare." d. 1700.

URBAN I., Pope, ur'-ban, succeeded Calixtus I. in 222. No particulars of his life are known, except that he suffered martyrdom in 230.

URBAN II. succeeded Victor III. in 1088. He caused Guibert, who had been supported as antipope under the title of Clement III., to be driven out of Rome; preached the first crusade in 1095, and convoked the councils of Bari, Clermont, and Rome. d. 1100.

URBAN III. (Hubert Crivelli, archbishop of Milan) was the successor of Lucius II., and was elected to the papal chair in 1155. He endeavoured to send assistance to the Christians in the East, who were being sorely pressed by Saladin; but his death took place before he could effect his object. d. 1157.

URBAN IV. became pope in succession to Alexander IV. in 1261. He excommunicated Manfred, king of Naples, and offered the crown to Charles, count of Provence and Anjou, and brother to Louis IX. of France, which led to the subsequent wars of the Anjous for the possession of Sicily and Naples. d. 1264.

URBAN V. was a Frenchman of a noble family, and had previously been abbot of St. Victor at Marseilles. At the death of Innocent VI., in 1362, he was elected to the papacy. He restored the papal seat from Avignon to Rome, founded many churches, and reformed numerous abuses. d. 1370.

URBAN VI. (Bartolomeo Prignano) succeeded Gregory XI. in 1378. The cardinals afterwards chose Robert of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and took up his residence at Avignon. Thus was originated the famous "Western Schism," which endured for nearly fifty years. d. at Rome, 1389.

URBAN VII. succeeded Sixtus in 1590, but died in less than a week afterwards.

URBAN VIII. (Massaeo Barberini) ascended the pontifical throne in 1623. He condemned the Jansenists, revised the hymns of the Roman Catholic Church, and was the author of some Latin and Italian poems. b. 1568; d. 1644.

URR, Andrew, ure, an eminent Scotch chemist, who was educated for the medical profession, and took his degree as M.D. in 1801, at Glasgow. After lecturing with some success upon chemistry, natural philosophy, and materia medica at Glasgow, he was nominated to the post of astronomer, upon an observatory being established in that city. In 1821 he produced a valuable work entitled "A Dictionary of Chemistry." He took up his residence in the metropolis in 1830, and was, four years afterwards, appointed analytical chemist to the Board of Customs. Among the more important of his subsequent works were, "The Cotton Manufactures of Great Britain," "The Philosophy of Manufactures," and "On the Arts and Manufactures." He was a fellow of the Royal, Geographical, Astronomical, and other Societies. b. at Glasgow, 1778; d. in London, 1857.

URFÉ, Honoré d', oor'-fai, a French poet, who wrote a celebrated romance entitled "L'Astrée," which was during almost half a century highly popular. He served with distinction under Henry IV., and afterwards as a diplomatist at Savoy and Venice. Some other less important poetical pieces emanated from him. b. 1588; d. at Nice, 1625.

URFÉ, Anne d', a French poet, and brother of the preceding, wrote, while a young man, 150 sonnets in honour of Diana of Chateau Morand, whom he afterwards married; but became divorced from her, being unable to endure the company of a number of dogs, which Diana, who was devoted to the chase, continually kept in her own and her husband's sleeping apartment. In 1599 he took holy orders, and afterwards composed some hymns. b. 1553; d. 1621.

URQUHART, Sir Thomas, of Cromarty, in Scotland, urk'-hart, a philologist and mathematician, was an officer among the followers of Charles II., and was present at the battle of Worcester; relative to which he published a piece, entitled "The Discovery of a most rare Jewel, found in the Krannel of Worcester Streets," &c. He was also the author of a work on Trigonometry; and one called "Logopandecteision, or an Introduction to the Universal Language;" but he is best known for his translation of the works of Rabelais.

URSINS, Anne Maria de la Tremouille, Princess des, oor'-si, a French lady, celebrated in her time for her political intrigues, was the daughter of the duke de Noirmoutier, and became the wife of Adrien Talemrand, Prince of Chalais, who was sent into exile for fighting a duel. Accompanied by the princess, he retired to Italy, where he died, the princess afterwards marrying the duke of Bracciano, chief of the powerful Italian family of Orsini. This old nobleman dying, his relict sold the duchy, but continued to style herself Princess des Ursins, the French form of Orsini. In 1701 she was appointed, at the instance of Louis XIV., camerarum-major to the young queen of Spain, first wife of Philip V., over both of whom she obtained a complete ascendancy, and was, in reality, the ruler of the kingdom. But when Elizabeth Farnese became the wife of Philip, she immediately dismissed the intriguing Frenchwoman, who retired to Rome, and there conducted the household of the Pretender James Stuart. Her "Memoirs and Correspondence," which, says an eminent authority, "interests us in the same way that 'Gil Blas' does, by their mixture of passion and adventure," were published at Rome in 1722, and again at Paris in 1826. b. 1612; d. at Rome, 1722.

URSINUS, John Henry, ur'-si-nus, an eminent German Lutheran divine, who became superintendent of the churches of Ratibon. His works consist of an ecclesiastical history and commentaries upon the ancient writers. b. 1667.

URSINUS, Zachariah, a celebrated German divine and reformer, who was an advocate of the Calvinistic doctrines, and being persecuted by the Lutherans, he retired to Heidelberg, whence to Nussstadt, where he became professor of divinity. His works are chiefly controversial. b. at Breslau, 1534; d. 1583.

URSINUS, Benjamin, a celebrated German preacher, who was nominated a bishop, and raised to noble rank by Frederick I. of Prussia in 1701. The bishop was in the habit of always commencing his sermons with "Once upon a time," and after the death of his royal patron, he made application to the new king, Frederick William I., that his salary as a bishop might be exempted from those rigorous measures of retrenchment with which Frederick William I. was inaugurating his reign. The royal answer contained only these words, "All that, was once upon a time." The pulpit oratory of Ursinus was, nevertheless, of a style very much superior to the other preachers of the period. He was a descendant of the celebrated reformer Zachariah Ursinus. b. about the commencement of the 18th century.

URSINUS, Fulvius, a learned Italian writer, who, entering into holy orders, became librarian to Cardinal Alexander Farnese, and received an annual pension from Pope Gregory XIII. He made a collection of valuable books and manuscripts, which he bequeathed to the library of the Vatican. His works consist of commentaries on Livy, Tacitus, and Sallust, and learned editions of Cicero, Polybius, and others. He also produced an edition of the Greek poets. b. at Rome, 1529; d. at the same city, 1600.

USERS, Nicolas Raymarus, ur'-sus, a Danish mathematician, who was in his youth a swineherd, and did not learn to read till he was 18. His after-progress was, however, very rapid, both in the languages and the sciences. He taught mathematics at Strasburg, whence he was invited to a professorship at Prague. He invented an astronomical system so like that of Tycho Brahe, as to involve him in a dispute with that astronomer respecting the right of discovery. b. 1600.

USVILLE (See DUMONT D'URVILLE.)

USHER or USSHER, James, ush'-er, an Irish prelate, whose uncle, Henry Usher, archbishop of Armagh, the founder of Trinity College, Dublin, placed him in that seminary, where he made great progress in all departments of learning. At the age of 16 he commenced a "Chronology of the Bible," in Latin, which was the origin of his great work, afterwards published under the title of "Annals of the Old and New Testaments." In 1607 he was appointed professor of Divinity at Dublin, and chancellor of St. Patrick's Cathedral. He was promoted to the bishopric of Meath in 1620, whence he was translated to the archbishopric of Armagh in 1626. On the breaking out of the Irish rebellion he retired to England, and was promoted to the see of Carlisle, from which he received no advantage, owing to the civil wars and the abolition of episcopacy, of which system he was a zealous advocate. The curators of the university of Leyden offered him a professorship, which he declined, as he also did an invitation from Cardinal Richelieu to settle in France, with the free exercise of his religion. Besides his "Annals," he published a "Body of Divinity;" the writings of Godesehal in support of predestination; "Antiquitates Ecclesiarum Britannicarum;" an edition of the epistles of Ignatius, Barnabas, and Polycarp, with notes; sermons and other learned works. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. b. at Dublin, 1580; d. 1656.

UVAROV, Sergey Semenovitch, u'-va-rov, a celebrated Russian statesman, who, in 1814, issued a pamphlet on the state of Europe at that period. He became minister of public instruction in 1818, although he was a man of decidedly advanced views. He was the means of procuring the foundation of many museums, institutions, and educational establishments for the benefit of his fellow countrymen. His principal works are, "Studies of Philology and Criticism," and "Political and Literary Sketches," but he is said to have left behind him an account of his own times which will probably prove a valuable contribution to modern history. b. about 1785; d. 1855.

VEDALE, Robert, yau'-dail, a noted botanist

VACARIUS, va-kai'-ri-us, an Italian jurist, who was one of the first that taught the Roman law in England, and, according to the chronicle of Robertus de Monte, "many, both rich and poor, resorted to him for instruction." He is stated to have composed nine books from the Code and Digests of the Roman system of jurisprudence, copies of which work are preserved in the town library of Bruges and Leipsic. Although he taught at Oxford, no copy of his works has been discovered at that university. Flourished early in the 12th century.

VAHR, Martin, val, an eminent Danish botanist, who studied under Linnaeus, and subsequently became professor of natural history in the university of Copenhagen. b. 1749; d. 1804.

VAILLANT, Wallerant, vai'-ya, an eminent Flemish portrait-painter, who was employed at the French court, and who assisted Prince Rupert in his experiments in mezzotint engraving. b. at Lille, 1623; d. at Amsterdam, 1677.

VAILLANT, Jean Foy, an eminent French numismatist, who studied medicine, in which he took his doctor's degree in his 24th year. Having shown an extraordinary knowledge of ancient coins, he was selected by Colbert to collect medals in Italy and the East for the royal cabinet. On his return he was taken by the Algerines. After a captivity of four months, he recovered his liberty, and being in danger of shipwreck, swallowed some of his most valuable medals. In 1702 he became pensionary of the Academy of Inscriptions. His principal works were, "History of the Cæsars;" "Seleucidarum Imperium;" "Historia Ptolemæorum Ægypti Regum;" "Nummi Antiqui Familiarum Romanarum;" and "Numismata Græca." b. at Beauvais, 1632; d. at Paris, 1706.

VAILLANT, Jean François Foy, was son of the preceding, and like him was a learned physician and medallist. He wrote a treatise on the Nature and Use of Coffee, and a dissertation on the Cabiri. b. at Rome, 1665; d. 1708.

VAILLANT, Sebastian, an eminent French physician and botanist, who became superintendent of the Jardin du Roi and a member of the Academy of Sciences. His principal works were, "Remarks on Tournefort's Botanical Institutions;" "Discourse on the Structure of Flowers;" "Botanicon Parisiense, or a Description of Plants which grow about Paris," with fine plates. b. at Vigny, near Pontoise, 1669; d. at Paris, 1722.

VAILLANT, François le, a celebrated French naturalist, who was the son of the French consul in Dutch Guiana. He spent three years in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, and also collected objects of natural history in Germany and at Surinam. Returning to Paris in 1755, he devoted the rest of his life to arranging his museum and composing his works, the most important of which were, "Natural History of the Birds of Africa;" "Travels in the Interior of Africa;" and the "Natural History of Birds of Paradise." b. in Dutch Guiana, 1753; d. in France, 1824.

VAILLANT, Jean Baptiste Philibert, Count, a French marshal, who was educated in the Polytechnic School, and entering the army, served in the campaign in Russia; but being taken prisoner, was retained a captive till the conclusion of the war. In 1815 he distinguished himself at Ligny and at Waterloo; and after the restoration of the Bourbons, served upon the staff. In 1834 he was sent to Africa to superintend the construction of fortifications. He was thus employed during eight years, at the end of which period he returned to Paris, and was engaged upon the defensive works of that capital. In the French expedition against Rome he acted as second in command. For his services there, he was created a marshal of France and a count. When Marshal Saint-Arnaud was sent in command of the army of the East, he succeeded to the office of minister of war. b. at Dijon, 1790.

VALCKENAE, Louis Caspar, valk'-nar, an eminent Dutch philologist and philosopher, who in 1755 was appointed professor of Greek and archaeology in the university of Leyden, a post he retained until his death. His works, which are esteemed as among the most masterly of those treating upon the learning of antiquity, principally are—editions, with notes, of some of the works of Euripides; the "Idylls" of Theocritus; and dissertations upon Herodotus, Callimæchus, and others. b. at Leeuwarden, Friesland, 1715; d. at Leyden, 1755.

VALCKENAE, Jan, an eminent Dutch jurist, who was son of the preceding. In 1787 he was appointed professor of jurisprudence at Utrecht; but having participated in the movement against William V., stadtholder of the Netherlands, he was, upon the intervention of Prussia, compelled to quit Holland. With other members of the patriotic party, he went to Paris, where he remained until the French army under Pichegru entered the Netherlands, when he was enabled to return to Leyden, and to be nominated professor of public law. He subsequently acted as ambassador of the Batavian republic at the courts of Madrid and Berlin. After Louis Napoleon became king of Holland, Valckenæer was dispatched upon a mission to Napoleon I., to plead against the contemplated annexation of Holland to the French empire. Upon the abdication of Louis Napoleon, he retired into private life, and passed his remaining years in the study of jurisprudence. His works upon political affairs are characterized by eloquence and close reasoning. b. at Leyden, 1759; d. near Haarlem, 1821.

VALENS, Flavius, vai'-lens, emperor of the East, a son of Count Gratian, became the colleague, in the government of the Roman empire, of his brother Valentinian, in 364. A zealous Arian, he violently persecuted the orthodox bishops. He forced the Goths to make peace, but imprudently suffered them to settle in Thrace, where they were joined by great numbers of barbarians, and the war being renewed, he marched against them, but was totally defeated near Adrianople. He was carried to his tent, which the enemy set on fire the emperor perishing in the flames. b. 373.

VALENTINE, Basil, val'-en-tine, a celebrate German alchemist, who was one of the founder of chemical science. His writings have been translated into Latin and English. The principal are, "The Triumphant Chariot of Ammony," "The Twelve Keys of Philosophy," at "Testament of Basil Valentine." Flourished in the 16th century.

VALENTINIAN I., Flavius, val'-en-tin'-i-an, emperor of the West, was the eldest son of Gratian. He divided the Roman empire into two portions, giving the east to his brother Valens, in 364, after which he defeated the Germans, and quelled the revolt in Africa. The Quadi and Sarmatæ having taken up arms in 374, he marched against them, and ravaged their country with fire and sword, which compelled them to sue for peace; but while he was addressing their ambassadors, he burst a blood-vessel, through excitement, of which he died, in 375.

VALENTINIAN II. was saluted emperor of his father's death, by the soldiery; but being only four years of age at that time, he was not in reality, emperor until his brother Gratian's death in 383. He was de throne by the usurper Maximus in 387; but Theodosius, after defeating Maximus, restored him in the year following. In 392 Valentianian II. was strangled by his general Arbogastes. He was a virtuous and pious prince.

VALENTINIAN III., emperor of the West, was the nephew of Theodosius II., and acknowledged emperor in 423, at the age of six years, under the guardianship of his mother Placidia, who governed with great prudence; but when Valentianian came of age, he plunged into debauchery, and ruled with such tyranny that he was assassinated in 455.

VALERIANUS, Publius Licinius, va-lee'-ri-ai'-nus, a Roman, who was proclaimed emperor by the soldiery in 253. He associated his son Gallienus with himself in the government, and persecuted the Christians. He made war on the Goths and Scythians with some success, but was taken prisoner in an expedition against Sapor, king of Persia, who carried him to his capital in triumph, and treated him with great barbarity. After his death, which happened in 260, of grief, Sapor ordered his body to be flayed, and the skin being tanned, was nailed up in a Persian temple.

VALERIANUS, Picirius, a learned Italian, who became apostolic notary under Leo X. and Julius II., having previously refused a bishopric. His chief works are Latin poems. b. in the state of Venice, about 1475; d. 1553.

VALERIUS, Publius, va-lee'-ri-us, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Publicola, for his popularity. He assisted Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and was the first to take an oath to support the liberty and independence of his country. He gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the son of Tarquin fell. Publicola became four times consul, and, after his death, received the thanks which a people redeemed from slavery usually pay to their deliverers. He was so poor that his body was buried at the public expense. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year.

VALERIUS FLACCUS. (See FLACCUS.) Caius Valerius.)

served with Sextus Pompeius in the Roman army in Asia; and at his return wrote a collection of remarkable actions and sayings of eminent Romans, dedicated to Tiberius. It was translated into English by Speed, and published in 1678. Flourished at the commencement of the 1st century.

VALESIUS, Henriens, or HENRY DE VALOIS, val'-waw, a learned French critic, who was educated for the legal profession, which he abandoned, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His merit procured him the place of historiographer to the king, and a pension. He also received another from the clergy of France for publishing an edition of the Greek ecclesiastical historians. His life of excessive study caused him to become blind. b. at Paris, 1603; d. 1676.

VALESIUS, or VALOIS, Adrien de, brother of the preceding, was also royal historiographer, and published, among other works, a History of France from 254 to 752. b. 1607; d. 1692.

VALLA, Lorenzo, val'-la, a learned Italian writer, and the most profound scholar of his time. He rescued the Latin language from Gothic barbarity; but having hazarded some free opinions respecting the doctrines of the Romish church, he was condemned to be burnt alive, but was saved by Alphonso, king of Naples. He was next confined in a monastery; but Pope Nicholas V., who respected his talents, called him to Rome, appointed him professor of rhetoric, and afterwards his secretary, and gave him a pension. His most important works were, "On the Elegance of the Latin Language;" "History of the Reign of Ferdinand, King of Aragon;" translations of Thucydides, Herodotus, and Homer's "Iliad;" Notes on the New Testament; treatise on Falschold and Truth; and Fables. b. at Kobre, about 1407; d. at the same city, 1457.

VALLANCY, or VALLANCE, val'-lance, a writer in the antiquities of Ireland, who, having a residence in that country as an engineer, devoted himself to the study of language, topography, and antiquities. He made a survey of the island, for which he received £1000; and wrote a "Grammar and Dictionary of the Irish Language," "Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicis," &c. He attained the rank of general, and was a member of several scientific institutions. b. 1732; d. 812.

VALLE, Pietro della, val'-lai, an Italian traveller, who journeyed through Turkey, Egypt, the Holy Land, Persia, and India, and, on his return to Rome, published an account of his travels in 54 letters, portions of which have been translated into English. b. at Rome, 1596; d. at the same city, 1652.

VALETTE. (See LA VALETTE, G. Parisot de.)

VALLI, Eusebio, val'-li, an Italian physician, famous for his researches on the plague and mow fever, of which latter he died at Milan, 1816. b. at Pistoja, 1762.

VALLIERE. (See LA VALLIERE, Louise Françoise de.)

VALLISNIERI, Antonio, val'-lis-ne-ai'-re, an eminent Italian naturalist, who studied under Malpighi, and afterwards became physician to the pope. His works abound in curious discoveries in natural history and medicine. b. near Modena, 1661; d. 1730.

VALMONT DE BOMARE, val'-mawn, an eminent French naturalist, who was intended for the gal profession, and during some years pursued a course of study to qualify him for practising at the French bar; but at length his greater love for natural science caused him to abandon jurisprudence altogether. The duke d'Argenson provided him with the means of visiting the chief cities of Europe, and, in 1756, he returned to the French capital with a valuable collection of objects of natural history. During the interval 1756-83, he read lectures upon natural history at Paris, and was offered professorships in Portugal and Russia, but refused. His most important works were, "Dictionnaire Raisonné Universel d'Histoire Naturelle," "Catalogue of a Cabinet of Natural History," and "New Exposition of the Mineral Kingdom." B. at Rouen, 1731; D. 1807.

VALPY, Rev. Richard, vâl'-pe, an eminent English classical scholar, who became head master of the grammar-school at Reading, which establishment rose to a high reputation under his direction. He was the author of, among other works, a Greek grammar and a Latin grammar. B. in the island of Jersey, 1754; D. in London, 1836.—His son, the Rev. Francis Valpy, succeeded him in the mastership of the Reading school.—Another son, A. J. Valpy, settled in business, in London, as a printer, and produced a number of learned works; among others, an edition of the "Thesaurus" of Stephens, and some of the Greek and Latin classics.

VAMBERG, Arminius, cam-bai'-re, a Hungarian who has gained considerable celebrity for his explorations of Central Asia in the disguise of a dervish. He has written a work entitled "Travels and Adventures in Central Asia," B. in Hungary about 1820.

VAN ACHTEN, Hans, fan a'-ken, a celebrated German painter, who was much employed by the emperor Rudolph II. His works have been reproduced by the most eminent engravers of the 17th century. B. at Cologne, 1552; D. at Prague, 1615.

VANBRUNEN, Sir John, van'-broo, a celebrated English dramatic writer and architect, who was descended of a family which had taken refuge in England during Alva's tyrannical rule in the Netherlands. After acquiring some celebrity as an architect, he commenced writing for the stage about 1695, producing "The Provoked Wife," "The Confederacy," and "The Relapse; or, Virtue in Danger," comedies which still hold their place on the stage. He was for some time Clarenceux king-of-arms, and in 1716 was appointed surveyor of Greenwich Hospital. He was also comptroller-general of works, and surveyor of the royal gardens. Sir John built several superb edifices, the principal of which is Blenheim, the seat of the duke of Marlborough. B. either in London or Cheshire, 1606; D. in London, 1726.

VANCOUVER, George, van'-koo-ver, a circumnavigator and captain in the British navy, served as a midshipman under Captain Cook; and a voyage of discovery, to ascertain the existence of any navigable communication between the North Pacific and North Atlantic oceans, being determined on, he was appointed to command it, and gave his name to an important island in the Pacific Ocean. "Vancouver's Voyage" was afterwards published by him. B. about 1750; D. 1798.

VANDALE, Antony, van'-dail, a learned Dutch physician, was at first engaged in mercantile pursuits, which he quitted for the study of physic. He wrote a "Treatise on the Oracles," which was abridged by Fontenelle; and was also the author of a work on the "Origin and Progress of Idolatry," a "Dissertation on Aristæus and the Septuagint Version," &c. B. 1633; D. at Haarlem, 1708.

VANDAMME, Dominique, van'-dam, a French general, entered the military service very young, and was made general of division in 1799, after distinguishing himself in the revolutionary campaigns of the Rhine. He served in most of Napoleon's campaigns against Austria in 1806-7-9; but was not in the Russian campaign of 1813, having been disgraced in consequence of some dispute with Jerome Bonaparte. But he had the command of the 32nd division in 1813. With that corps he fell into an ambuscade at Kulm, his forces were nearly all cut to pieces, and himself, being made prisoner, was sent to Kasan, near Siberia. He was restored to freedom by the peace of 1814, and joining Bonaparte during the Hundred Days, served in Grouchy's division at the time of the battle of Waterloo. He made a skilful retreat, and offered the provisional government to defend Paris with the 80,000 troops he had saved and collected; but was compelled by the negotiations to retire behind the Loire. In 1816 he was banished by ordonnance to Ghent, and afterwards fixed his residence in the United States, but was ultimately permitted to re-enter France, and put on half-pay in 1824. B. 1771; D. 1830.

VANDER-MEER, Jan, van'-der-meer, an eminent Dutch artist, who excelled in painting landscapes and sea views. B. at Rotterdam, 1627; D. about 1691. His son, of the same name, was also a clever artist in representing landscapes and animals. B. 1658; D. 1706.

VANDER-MEULEN, Antony Francis, van'-der-mu'-len, a celebrated Flemish artist, who settled at Paris, and excelled in painting horses, hunting-parties, sieges, and battles. He executed representations on the spot of most of the actions in which Louis XIV. was engaged. His best works are in the Louvre and at Versailles. B. at Brussels, 1634; D. at Paris, 1690.

VANDER-MEULEN, Peter, brother of the preceding, was engaged to paint battle-pieces for William III. of England.

VANDER-MONDE, Charles Augustin, van'-der-monde, an eminent physician, who wrote a "Collection of Medical and Surgical Observations," "Essay on the Manner of Perfecting the Human Species," and "Dictionary of Health." B. at Macao, 1727; D. at Paris, 1782.

VANDEVELDE, Adrian, van'-der-veld, an eminent Dutch painter, who excelled in depicting landscapes, which he adorned with figures. He also painted historical subjects, and all his works are scarce and valuable. B. at Amsterdam, 1639; D. 1672.

VANDEVELDE, or VANDEVELDE, William called the Old, a celebrated Dutch painter. In consequence of the successful manner in which he depicted the naval engagements between the English and Dutch, he was invited to England by Charles II., in 1673, and obtained a pension from the crown. B. at Leyden, 1610; D. in England, 1693.

VANDEVELDE, William, styled the Younger, an eminent Dutch artist, and son of the preceding. He painted, like his father, sea-pieces and shipping. B. at Amsterdam, 1633; D. in London, 1707.

Dutch painter, who was educated under Rubens. He resided some time at Rome, and then removed to Genoa, where he was employed by Prince Philibert of Savoy, and other high personages. On his return to Flanders, his reputation rose to such a height that Cardinal Richelieu invited him to settle in France; but he preferred visiting England, where he had previously been, and was employed by Charles I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. His best works were done in England, where he married a grand-daughter of the earl of Gowrie. He painted historical subjects, particularly descent from the cross, at Antwerp; but his fame mostly rests upon his portraits of royal and noble personages. His masterpieces are held to be the portrait of the earl of Strallford at Wentworth House, and the head of Gevartius in the National Gallery, which last is, however, believed by some to be the work of Rubens. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral. b. at Antwerp, 1599; d. in London, 1641.

VAN DYCK, Harry Stoe, a poetical and miscellaneous writer, was the author of "Theatrical Portraits," "The Gondola," a series of tales, and "Songs," set to music. He also contributed to Dr. Bowring's "Batavian Anthology." b. in London, 1798; d. 1838.

VANE, Sir Henry, van-ne, an English patriot was eldest son of Sir Henry Vane, secretary of state to Charles I. After studying at Oxford, he went to Geneva, where he imbibed a dislike to the principles upon which his native country was then governed; on which account he quarrelled with his father, and made a voyage to New England. He returned in 1637, and upon the breaking out of the civil war, took an active part against the king. He, however, opposed the usurpation of Cromwell, who caused him to be imprisoned. After the Restoration, he was one of the twenty excepted out of the act of general pardon, and was sent to the Tower. In 1662 he was brought to trial for high treason, found guilty, and beheaded on Tower-hill. He wrote some political and theological works. b. about 1612.

VANINI, Lucilio, va-ne-ne, an Italian sceptic, who promulgated a pantheistical system of philosophy, out of the works of Aristotle, Averroes, and Cardan. He also preached upon his philosophy in Germany, Holland, and England. In 1617 he was arrested at Toulouse, and condemned to death by the Parliament there. He wrote, according to some, in support of atheism; but others have defended him from the charge. b. in the province of Otranto, July, 1585; burnt alive in 1619.

VANLOO, Jean Baptiste, van-loo, a celebrated French artist, who painted many portraits of illustrious personages in so fine a style as to bear away the palm from every rival both in Paris and in London. b. at Aix, Provence, 1684; d. at the same city, 1748.—His two sons were also eminent as painters.

VANLOO, Charles André, brother and pupil of the above, after visiting Italy, became painter to Louis XV., chevalier of the order of St. Michael, and a member of the Academy of Painting. He executed many fine historical pictures for the king of France. According to Diderot, he could neither read nor write. b. at Nice, 1705; d. at Paris, 1765.

VANMANDER, Charles, van-man-dër, a Dutch historical and landscape painter, and poet, who executed works at Rome, Vienna, and in Holland. He set up an academy at Haarlem, and trained there many pupils, who afterwards became eminent artists. In literature, he produced songs, translations of the "Iliad," Ovid's "Metamorphoses," and compiled the biographies of celebrated German, Dutch, and Italian painters. His principal pictures are, "Adam and Eve in Paradise," and "The Deluge." b. near Courtray, 1543; d. at Amsterdam, 1606. At his death, 300 of his pupils and fellow-townsmen attended his remains to the tomb.

VANNI, Francis, van-ne, an Italian historical painter, who chiefly worked on religious subjects. b. at Siena, about 1563; d. at the same city, 1600.

VAN PRAET, prait, a celebrated biblioplist, who became one of the conservators of the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris, and enriched that establishment by obtaining for it many valuable works. His principal work is entitled "Catalogue of Works Printed upon Vellum." b. at Bruges, 1754; d. at Paris, 1837.

VANSOMER, Paul, van-so-mer, a celebrated Flemish portrait painter, who settled in England, where he was greatly encouraged by James I. and the nobility. Some of his portraits are at Hampton Court Palace. b. at Antwerp, about 1576; d. in London, 1821.

VAN SWIETEN, Gerard, van-swe-ten, an eminent Dutch physician, who became the pupil of Boerhaave, after which he went to Vienna, where he was appointed physician and librarian to the empress Maria Theresa. He also lectured on the materia medica and practice of physic with great reputation in that city, where he performed many eminent cures. His principal work is a Commentary on the "Aphorisms of Boerhaave," which has been translated into English. b. at Leyden, 1700; d. at Vienna, 1772.

VANTOCCI. (See SARTO, Andrea del.)

VANTIVELLI, Luigi, van-va-tail-le, a celebrated Italian architect, who was of Flemish extraction, and at first worked as a painter; but having studied architecture under Ivrea, he made designs for several churches and other edifices, which raised him to so high a reputation, that the king of Naples selected him as the architect of the palace at Caserta, one of the finest buildings erected in the 18th century. He also designed the immense aqueducts which supply water to that palace, the cavalry barracks, and three churches at Naples. In 1757 he produced a work upon the Palace at Caserta. b. at Naples, 1700; d. 1773.

VAPEREAU, Louis Gustave, va-pe-ro, a modern French littérateur, who, on completing his educational career, became the private secretary of Victor Cousin, and afterwards taught philosophy in the college of Tours. In 1852 he entered upon the study of jurisprudence, and was, two years later, admitted an advocate. Soon afterwards, he was appointed editor of a work of considerable importance, entitled "Dictionnaire Universel des Contemporains," to which task he devoted himself during four years. He also furnished some articles to another valuable work, entitled "Dictionnaire des Sciences Philosophiques." b. at Orleans, 1819.

VARCHI, Benedetto, var-ke, a learned Italian writer, who became, under Cosmo I., duke of Florence, director of the New Florentine Academy. His principal work is the "History of Florence," from 1527 to 1533; but he was also the author of several poems, and a work entitled "Ereplano, or Dialogues on the Philosophy of Language." B. at Florence, 1502; D. at the same city, 1555.

VARENIUS, Bernhardus, va-re-ni-us, an eminent Dutch physician, who wrote an excellent "System of Universal Geography," which was republished, with great improvements, by Sir Isaac Newton in 1672, and has been translated into English. He was also the author of a curious "Description of Japan and Siam." D. 1660.

VARGAS, Francisco, var'-gas, a celebrated Spanish jurisconsult, and ambassador from Charles V. to the Council of Trent. On his return to Spain he was appointed a counsellor of state. He wrote a work on the "Jurisdiction of the Pope and Bishops," for which he incurred the resentment of the court of Rome; also, "Memoirs of the Council of Trent." D. 1560.

VARIENON, Pierre, va-reen'-yawng, an eminent French mathematician, who became professor of mathematics in the Mazarin College. His most important works are, a treatise on Mechanics, "Elements of Mathematics," treatise upon the Motion of running Waters, and numerous papers in the "Memoirs" of the Academy. B. at Caen, Normandy, 1654; D. at Paris, 1722.

VARILLAS, Antoine, va'-reel-la, a French historian, who became historiographer to Gaston, duke of Orleans, and sub-librarian in the Royal Library at Paris. He wrote a "History of France," "Anecdotes of Florence, or the Secret History of the House of Medici," "History of the Revolution in Europe on account of Religion," and other works. B. at Guéret, La Marche, 1624; D. at Paris, 1696.

VARIUS, Lucius, var'-i-us, a Latin poet, who was the intimate friend of Virgil and Horace, and was appointed by Augustus to examine and revise the "Æneid." Some fragments only of his works have survived. D. about 11 B.C.

VARLEY, John, var'-le, an eminent English water-colour painter, who was among the first to produce works in that department of art which exhibited either force or breadth of treatment—all the water-colour drawings executed before his innovations having been little better than tinted engravings. Although in receipt of a large income, he became involved in difficulties, chiefly through his attachment to the study of astrology. B. in London, about 1777; D. 1842.

VON ENSE, Karl August, farn-ka'-gen, a modern German miscellaneous writer, who, in early life, abandoned his studies to enter the Austrian army, and fought at the battle of Wagram, where he was wounded. He subsequently held a commission in the Russian army, but quitted it to enter the Prussian diplomatic service. He was at the congress of Vienna in 1814, and in the following year became minister at Carlsruhe. The most important of his numerous works were—"History of the Vienna Congresses;" "Goëthe from the testimony of his Contemporaries;" "Lives of General Seydlitz and Field-marshal Keith;" "Memoirs and Miscellaneous Writings;" and a treatise on the "Writing of History and Literature." B. at Dusseldorf, 1785; D. 1853.

VARRO, Marcus Terentius, var'-ro, a Roman writer, who served under Pompey against Cæsar, and upon the defeat of the former, retired from the army; and having conciliated the favour of Cæsar, he was employed in superintending the Greek and Latin libraries at Rome. Equally learned as a historian, grammarian, poet, and naturalist, he was extolled by all his contemporaries. He dedicated to Cicero a treatise on the Latin language, and wrote a work upon agriculture, entitled "De Re Rusticâ," both of which are extant, with some fragments of his Menippean satires. B. at Rome, 116 B.C.; D. 27 B.C.

VARRO, Publius Terentius, styled Atacinus, a Latin poet. He wrote a poem, "De Bello Sequanico," and translated into Latin verse the "Argonautics" of Apollonius. Only some fragments of these works remain. B. in Gallia Narbonensis, 82 B.C.; D. 37 B.C.

VARUS, Quintilius, var'-rus, a Roman proconsul, who was descended from an illustrious family, was appointed governor of Syria, and afterwards became commander of the armies in Germany. Surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that everything was lost, he killed himself, 10 A.D. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus, at Rome, by one of the barbarian chiefs.

VARUS, Quintilius, a friend of Horace, and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a great critic, as Horace, in his "Art of Poetry," seems to imply. The poet has addressed the 15th ode of his first book to him, and in the 24th he pathetically mourns his death.

VASA. (See GUSTAVUS I.)

VASARI, George, va-sa'-re, an Italian painter, architect, and biographer, who studied under Del Sarto and Michael Angelo, and copied the remains of ancient sculpture; but was deficient in colouring. He wrote the "Lives of celebrated Painters, Sculptors, and Architects." B. at Arezzo, 1512; D. at Florence, 1574.

VASCASAN, Michael, vas'-ka-sa, an eminent French printer, who was one of the first of the Paris printers that discarded the use of the Gothic characters in their books. B. about 1500; D. about 1576.

VASQUEZ, Gabriel, vas'-kai, a celebrated Spanish theologian, who became professor of theology at Alcalá, and afterwards at Rome. He obtained the surname of the "luminary of Spanish theology." B. 1551; D. 1604.

VASQUEZ, Alphonso, an eminent Spanish painter and sculptor, who was engaged to design the superb catafalque of Philip II. He likewise adorned the great edifices of Spain with frescoes and oil paintings. B. 1557; D. 1605.

VATABLUS, François, va-ta-bloos, a learned French Orientalist, who became professor of Hebrew in the Royal College of Paris, and had so profound a knowledge of the Hebrew as to astonish the most learned Jews. He wrote notes for Stephens's Bible. These were condemned by the faculty of theology at Paris, but they are very highly esteemed. D. 1547.

VATER, John Severin, fu'-ter, an eminent German philologist and theologian, who became professor of theology and Oriental languages at the university of Halle. His most important works were—a continuation of the "Mithridates" of Adelung; "Handbook of the Grammar of the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldaic, and Arabic Languages;" "Ecclesiastical History and Exposition of the New Testament." B. at Altenburg, 1771; D. at Halle, 1826.

VATTEL, Emmerich, vat'-tel, a celebrated Swiss writer on jurisprudence, who entered the service of the king of Poland, whose minister to the republic at Berne he became. He devoted the leisure left by his diplomatic duties to the composition of works which have made his name famous. After putting forth some less important works, he, in 1753, published his "Treatise on the Law of Nations; or, the Principles of Natural Law applied to the Conduct of States and Sovereigns." This is esteemed a standard authority upon the subject of which it treats, and takes rank with Grocius and Puffendorf. B. at Neuchâtel, 1714 D. 1767.

VAUBAN, Sebastian le Prestre, seigneur de vo'-bâ, a celebrated French engineer, who entered the army in his 17th year, and in a short time evinced an extraordinary genius for the science of fortification and military tactics. After serving during some time under the Prince of Condé in the Spanish army, he was taken prisoner by the royalists, and was urged by Mazarin to enter the service of the king. Taking this offer of the cardinal, he distinguished himself at the siege of St. Menchould, and, in 1659, at Gravelines, Oudenarde, and Apros. Louis XIV., appreciating his military genius, next employed him to strengthen the fortifications of Dunkirk and Lille, of which he was nominated governor. At Maestricht, Valenciennes, and Ghent, his military skill was also triumphant, and after the signature of the peace of Nimègue, in 1678, he was engaged in strengthening the fortresses of his native country. On the renewal of war, he took Mannheim, and constructed a remarkable intrenched camp at Dunkirk, which was his last great effort. For his eminent services he was created a marshal of France, and received many marks of his sovereign's esteem. His principal works are—treatise on Fortification, under the title of "The French Engineer;" "Now Treatise on the Attack and Defence of Places;" "Essays upon Fortification;" "Political Testament of M. de Vauban." B. near Saulieu, in Burgundy, 1633; D. 1707.

VAUCANSON, Jacques de, vo'-kan-sawng, a French mechanician, who evinced a love for the mechanical arts from his childhood, and at a very early age constructed some remarkable pieces of machinery. In 1738 he exhibited at Paris an automaton figure of a flute-player, which was six feet in height, and which executed the various notes precisely like a living performer. He subsequently made a flageolet-player, and a duck which swam, quacked, waved its wings, arranged its feathers, accepted barley from the hand, and digested its food. The last operation was performed by placing in the interior of the automaton certain substances which made a solution of the food. He also distinguished himself by his improvements in silk-dressing machinery. B. at Grenoble, 1709; D. 1782.

VAUGHAN, Sir John, vaw'n, a celebrated lawyer, who, after studying at Christchurch College, Oxford, removed to the Inner Temple, London, where he contracted an intimacy with Selden, who made him one of his executors. During the civil war he lived in retirement, but in 1668 was made chief justice of the Common Pleas. B. 1608; D. 1674.

VAUGHAN, Sir John, D.C.L., one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas, was called to the bar in his twenty-fourth year, and in seven years more was made a serjeant. He was made a baron of the Exchequer in 1827, and in 1834 became a judge of the Common Pleas and a privy councillor. B. 1772; D. 1839.

VAUGHAN, Rev. Robert, a modern English Independent divine and writer, who was, during several years, professor of history in the London University, since called University College. In 1813 he was appointed president of the Lancashire Independent College at Manchester, which office he retained until the year 1857. In 1844 he started "The British Quarterly Review." His most important works were, "Life and Opinions of John de Wycliffe;" "Memorials of the Stuart Dynasty;" "The Causes of the Corruption of Christianity;" "Congregation-

Vaux, Nicholas, Lord, vo, a gallant English nobleman, who displayed such proofs of valour at the battle of Newark, in 1487, that he received the honour of knighthood. He became a great favourite with Henry VIII., and was created a peer. B. 1530. In the "Paradise of Dainty Devises" are several elegant poems by Lord Vaux, who is supposed to have been the eldest son of Lord Nicholas Vaux.

Vaux, Noel Jourdan de, a French nobleman and marshal of France, who distinguished himself as a soldier in Italy, Corsica, and Bohemia. At Fontenoy his bravery was particularly conspicuous. He also rendered eminent service at the sieges of Brussels and at the battle of Rocoux. In 1760 he was charged with the defence of Friedburg. In 1769 he held the command in Corsica, which he completely subdued. For his great services he was made commander-in-chief of Burgundy, and a marshal of France. B. in Burgundy, 1705; D. 1785.

VEGA, Lope Felix de, vai'-ga, a distinguished Spanish poet, who became secretary to the duke of Alva, and after the death of his first wife, to whom he was much attached, served as a soldier in the "Invincible Armada." Escaping the dangers of that disastrous expedition, he entered the employment of a Spanish nobleman. On losing his second wife, he took holy orders. Pope Urban VII. created him doctor of divinity, sent him the cross of the order of Malta, and gave him a place in the apostolic exchequer. Throughout the whole of his varied career he continued to exercise his fertile pen. His principal performances are comedies, which were acted with such success at Madrid as to produce the author a considerable fortune. His composition was so ready, and his invention so fertile, that he sometimes wrote a comedy in a single day. According to one of his eulogists, he printed 22,300,000 lines. Without taking into account the works which have been lost, or those which remain in manuscript, there exist of his writings 497 plays, and 21 religious poems, besides burlesque poems, epics, novels, and allegories. B. at Madrid, 1562; D. 1635.

VEGETIUS, Flavius Renatus, ve-jé-shi-us, a Latin writer on military subjects, whose principal production was "Military Institutions," which gives a very exact view of the ancient tactics; but he also wrote a "Treatise on the Veterinary Art." The "Military Institutions" was translated and printed by Caxton, under the title of "The Fayt of Armes and Chyvalry." Flourished about 355 A.D.

VEIL, Charles Marie de, vail, a Jew, who was converted to Christianity by Bossuet, and was appointed a canon of the order of St. Augustine; but repaired to England about 1679, and became Baptist preacher. He wrote "Commentaries on the Minor Prophets and other Books of the Scripture." b. about 1690.—His brother Louis was also converted, and became a Protestant. b. about 1700.

VELASQUEZ, Diego Rodriguez de Silva, re-las'-kai, a distinguished Spanish painter. Philip IV. appointed him his first painter, conferred on him the order of knighthood, and granted him a liberal pension. Few of his pictures are to be seen out of his native country. "It is impossible," says an important authority, "to estimate Velasquez without going to Spain. Grievous is the error of those who suppose him only to be the portrait-painter of sallow mustachioed Spaniards in black cloaks. He drew the minds of men; they live, breathe, and seem ready to walk out of the frames. . . . The freshness, individuality, and identity of each person are quite startling. . . . After a few days spent in the Royal Gallery of Madrid, we fancy that we have actually been acquainted with the royal family and court of his day, and that we have actually lived with them." b. at Seville, 1599; d. at Madrid, 1660.

VELLEUS-PATERCULUS. (See PATERCULUS, Velleius.)

VELTHEIM, A. F., Count, felf'-hime, an eminent German mineralogist, who became superintendent of the mines in the Hartz, and published a "Dissertation on the Formation of Basalts," another on the "Vases of the Ancients;" on "Memnon's Statue;" and the "Barberini, or Portland Vase." The university of Helmstadt conferred on him a doctor's degree, and the king of Prussia created him a count. b. 1801.

VENDÔME, César, Duke de, vain'-dome, was eldest son of Henry IV., by Gabrielle d'Estrées. He was legitimated in 1595, and afterwards nominated governor of the province of Brittany. After the decease of his father, he became the leader of the opposition faction, but subsequently joined the court against the Huguenots. He and his brother Alexander were, in 1626, arrested and confined during four years, on the charge of conspiring against the life of Richelieu. In 1641 he was again about to be arrested upon a similar charge, but escaped to England, where he continued to reside until after the death of Richelieu. He became governor of Burgundy in 1650; in 1655 he defeated the Spanish fleet at Barcelona, having previously captured Bordeaux from the malcontents. b. 1594; d. at Paris, 1665.

VENDÔME, Louis Joseph, Duke de, a celebrated French general, who was the grandson of César, duke de Vendôme, one of the illegitimate sons of Henry IV. At an early age he entered the army as a volunteer under Louis XIV. in Holland. After passing through the different ranks, he became a general, and was sent to Spain, where he took Barcelona, in 1697. Louis XIV. named him commander-in-chief in Italy, in 1702, in the room of Villeroi, who had been very unsuccessful. Vendôme changed the aspect of affairs, and gained several victories over the Imperialists. In 1705 he defeated Prince Eugene at Cassano, and was on the point of taking Turin, when he was recalled to take the command in Flanders, where he was signally defeated, at Oudenarde, by the duke of Marlborough. He then went to Spain, restored Philip V. to his capital, and took 4000 men, under Lord Stanhope, prisoners. b. 1654; d. at Tignaroz, Spain, 1712.

VENDÔME, Philip, Duke de, and the last who bore the title, was the brother of the preceding. While an infant, he was enrolled in the order of Malta, of which he ultimately became grand prior. He was the companion of his brother in his battles, till having, by his indolence, nearly caused the ruin of the French army by the Austrians, at Cassano, in 1706, he was sent into exile by Louis XIV. Retiring to Rome, he remained there during five years, at the end of which time he was permitted to return to his native country. When, in 1715, an attack of the Turks upon Malta was apprehended, he went to the island to take the command. The Turks not making their appearance, he returned to France, where he spent the remainder of his life in a licentious manner. b. 1655; d. at Paris, 1727.

VENERONI, Jean, ven'-ai-ro'-ne, an eminent French writer, who taught Italian at Paris, and, in order to pass for a Florentine, Italianized his name from Vigneron to Veneroni. He wrote "A Method of Learning Italian," which has been translated into English; "A Dictionary, Italian and French, and French and Italian;" "Select Fables;" and "The Letters of Loreau and Cardinal Bentivoglio" translated into French. Lived in the early part of the 18th century.

VENEZIANO, Domenico, vai-nait'-se-a'-no, an eminent Venetian painter, who introduced oil-painting at Florence; but having excited the jealousy of Castagno, whom he taught to colour in oils, he was basely murdered by him. b. at Venice, about 1410; killed near Florence, 1464.

VENEZIANO, Agostino, a celebrated Venetian engraver, who produced portraits of Barbarossa, of Charles V., Francis I. of France, and copied many of Raffaele's designs. b. at Venice, near the close of the 15th century; d. about 1540.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, Otho, vain, a Dutch painter, who studied under Zuccherro at Rome; after which he went to Antwerp, and thence to Brussels. He was a good writer, and published "Amorum Emblemata," and several other works, with plates after his own designs. Rubens was his disciple. b. at Leyden, 1566; d. at Brussels, 1634.

VENN, Henry, ven, an English divine, who became fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge. He wrote the "Complete Duty of Man" (not to be confounded with the "Whole Duty of Man"), and "Mistakes in Religion exposed." b. in Surrey, 1725; d. near London, 1796.

VENNER, Tobias, ven'-ner, an English physician, who wrote a work entitled "Via Recta ad Vitam Longam; or, an Easy Way to a Long Life;" also a "Treatise on the Bath Waters." b. at Petherton, Somersetshire, 1577; d. 1660.

VENNER, Thomas, an English fanatic, who during the reign of Charles II. preached against all government, republican and monarchical, asserting that the kingdom of Jesus on earth was begun. He and his followers were called Fifth-monarchy Men; and soon after the Restoration they proclaimed King Jesus publicly in the street; for which Venner and twelve others were executed in 1661.

VERDI, Giuseppe, vair'-de, a modern Italian musical composer, who studied his art under Lavigna at Milan, and in 1839 produced his first work. It was not, however, until he gave to the public his "Nabucco," in 1842, that he acquired a name as a musical writer, and became the most popular composer of the time; his operas of "Rigoletto," "Trovatore," "Traviata," &c., being constantly played. n. at Roncoule, Parma, 1814.

VERE, Edward, veer, Earl of Oxford, an English nobleman, eminent for his valour and literary talents. In 1588 he sat upon the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and held a command in the fleet which fought the Spanish armada. His poems were much admired in his time. There is a specimen in Percy's "Reliques of Ancient Poetry," and another in "England's Parnassus." n. about 1540; d. 1604.

VERE, Sir Francis, an English general, who, in 1535, went to Holland with the forces sent to assist the Dutch by Queen Elizabeth, under the command of the earl of Leicester. In 1596 he was appointed governor of Flushing, and afterwards distinguished himself at the battle near Nieuport, and by his gallant defence of Ostend, which he held for upwards of three years against the Spaniards. He displayed equal bravery and skill at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom and on many other occasions. b. 1554; d. 1608.

VERE, Sir Horace, was younger brother of the preceding, with whom he served in Holland, and afterwards had the command of the forces sent by King James to the Palatinate. In 1605 he escaped, by a series of skillful manoeuvres, from Spinola, at the head of 12,000 men, while Sir Horace had only 4000. He was created Lord Vere by Charles I. d. 1635.

VERELIUS, Olaus, ve-re-li-us, an eminent Swedish antiquarian writer, who became professor of Swedish antiquities, and antiquary to Charles IX. His works, which are very valuable, are principally devoted to an elucidation of the early history and antiquities of Scandinavia. b. 1618; d. 1682.

Charles Gravier, Count de, vair-en, a French statesman, who, in 1755, was sent as ambassador to Constantinople, and afterwards to Sweden; but, when Louis XVI. came to the throne, in 1774, he was recalled, and made minister of foreign affairs. He displayed the qualities of a profound statesman, particularly in the peace of 1783, during which he negotiated a treaty of commerce with England and another with Russia. b. at Dijon, 1717; d. 1787.

VERGIL, Polydore, ver-jil, an Italian historian, who visited England in the suite of Cardinal Corneto, the pope's legate, in 1503. Henry VIII. was so pleased with his wit and address, that he gave him the archdeaconry of Wells; but he returned to his native country in 1550. His principal works are, "De Inventoribus Rerum," "Treatise on Prodigies," "Adagiorum, or Proverbs," and a History of England in Latin, which, however, is more elegant than faithful. b. at Urbino, about 1470; d. 1555.

VERGNAUD, Pierre Victorin, vair-ne-o, a leader of the Girondist party in the French Revolution, remarkable for the brilliant energy of his oratory; who, with Gensonne and Gaudet, opposed the sanguinary measures of Robespierre; but being beaten in the struggle, were accused before the revolutionary tribunal, and sent to the guillotine. Vergnaud, like many of his colleagues, refused to escape; he had prepared a subtle poison for himself, but as there was not enough for all his fellow-victims, he generously resolved to suffer with them. b. 1757, guillotined, 1793. (See Lamartine's "History of the Girondists.")

VERMEYEN, Philip, vair-hi-en, an eminent

Dutch anatomist, who worked as an agricultural labourer till he was 22 years of age, and then gained a place at the university of Louvain, where he studied medicine, received his doctor's degree, and obtained a professorship. His most important works were, "Anatomy of the Human Body," "Defence of Harvey's Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood," and treatises upon diseases of the head and chest; all these works being written in Latin. n. 1648; d. 1710.

VERMEYEN, John Cornelius, vair-mi-en, an eminent Dutch painter, whose beard was so long as to reach the ground. He was much employed and esteemed by the emperor Charles V. b. near Haerlem, 1500; d. at Brussels, 1559.

VERMIGLI, Peter Martyr, vair-mel-ye, an Italian divine, who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and was, in 1547, invited to England by Cranmer; but after the accession of Mary he retired to Strasburg, where he became professor of divinity. He wrote commentaries on the Scriptures, and epistles to the Protestant churches in Poland and England, as well as to Melancthon and Calvin. b. at Florence, 1500; d. at Zurich, 1562.

VERNET, Claude Joseph, vair-nai, a French artist, who was highly esteemed, and became the first marine painter in Europe. b. at Avignon, 1711; d. 1789.

VERNET, Antoine Charles Horace, usually styled Carle, a celebrated French painter, who was the son of the preceding, under whom he acquired his earliest knowledge of his art. After gaining the grand prize of the Academy of Paris in 1783, he repaired to Rome, in which city he studied the great Italian masterpieces during several years. Returning to Paris, he rose to considerable reputation, and became a member of the Institute of France. He particularly excelled as a battle-painter, his best works in this walk being "The Battle of Marengo," "The Battle of Austerlitz," "John Sobieski forcing the Turks to raise the Siege of Vienna," and the "Taking of Pampoluna." b. at Bordeaux, 1758; d. at Paris, 1836.

VERNET, Horace, a celebrated French painter, and son of the preceding. In his early youth Paris was in a state of revolution, and, art finding few patrons, his father's circumstances were so straitened that Horace had, while still a child, to assist in eking out the family income by making small drawings for tradesman's invoices, fashion-books, &c. In this way he was preparing for the attainment of that astonishing facility for which he was afterwards famous. After serving for a short time in the ranks of the French army, he entered upon the task of representing on canvas incidents of military life. His "Capture of the Redoubt," "Halt of French Soldiers," and others of the same kind, gained him universal estimation; and he went on increasing in skill and popularity until 1819, when he produced his "Massacre of the Mamelukes," which placed him at the head of his particular walk in the artistic profession. Charles X. nominated him an officer of the Legion of Honour, and, after the Revolution of 1830, he became a favourite painter with Louis Philippe, who commissioned him to adorn the Constantine Gallery and the Gallery of French History at Versailles with a number of battle-pieces, illustrative of the Algerine campaigns, and of the other triumphs of the French army. Among his finest works in the military series may be named "The Capture of the Smala of Abd-el-Kader," which is one of the largest, if not the largest, painting in the world. He also executed some fine pictures of Eastern life, such as the "Lion-Hunt," "Arab Mother Rescuing her Child from a Lion," and "Council of Arabs." The other works of this gifted and prolific artist are very numerous and highly esteemed. In 1842 he was created a commander of the Legion of Honour, having previously refused to be elevated to the rank of a baron. n. at Paris, 1789; d. 1863.

VERNON, Edward, ver'-non, a brave English admiral, who captured Porto Bello in 1739, but was unsuccessful in his expedition against Carthage, in South America, in 1741. n. in London, 1694; d. 1757.

VERNON, Robert, a munificent English patron of art, who, in 1847, presented to the trustees of the National Gallery a collection of 157 pictures by British artists. This splendid bequest has been combined with the similar ones of Mr. Sheepshanks and the painter Turner, thereby forming the nucleus of a magnificent gallery of the works of the English school of artists. Mr. Vernon was b. 1774; d. 1849.

VERONESE, Paul Cagliari, surnamed, ver-onai'-sai, a celebrated Italian painter, who was the son of a sculptor. His genius for the art in which he subsequently excelled was manifested at an early age. He took Titian and Tintoretto as his models, emulating the fine design and composition of the first, with the gorgeous colouring of the latter. Finding himself unappreciated at Verona, he took up his residence at Venice, which city he embellished with a series of masterpieces. His most admired works are, "The Marriage of Cana," "The Feast of St. Simon, with Magdalene washing the Saviour's feet," and "Christ at Table with his Disciples." His brother, Benedetto Cagliari, assisted him in several of his works, as did also his son, surnamed Carletto, who promised to become a great painter, but died in his 26th year. Paul Veronese was born at Verona, about 1530; d. 1558.

VERRO, Antonio, ver'-re-o, an Italian painter, who was invited to England by Charles II., and employed upon the decorations of Windsor Castle. Nearly all the ceilings, and a side of St. George's Hall, were executed by him; but most of his designs have been removed. He subsequently painted for James II. and William III. Walpole says: "His exuberant pencil was ready at pouring out gods, goddesses, kings, emperors, and triumphs, over those public surfaces on which the eye never rests long enough to criticise, and where one should be sorry to place the works of a better master—I mean ceilings and staircases." n. about 1639; d. at Hampton Court, 1707.

VERRIUS, Flaccus, ver'-ri-us, an eminent Roman grammarian, who was nominated by the emperor Augustus tutor to his two grandsons, Caius and Lucius, sons of Agrippa. There remain of his works numerous fragments, which have been collected and published by Faggin and others. Flourished about the commencement of the 1st century.

VERROCCHIO, Andrea del, ver'-ro-ke'-o, an Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and goldsmith, who was the master of Leonardo da Vinci, Perugino, and other celebrated artists. He executed some fine statues in bronze, but his paintings were indifferent. n. at Florence, 1432; d. at Venice, 1458.

VERSTEGAN, Richard, vers'-te-gan, an English antiquary, who was of Flemish extraction. Being a Roman Catholic, he, some time previously to the year 1535, went to Antwerp, where he wrote a work entitled "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities concerning the most Noble and Renowned English Nation." He also produced "The Sundry Successive Regal Governments of England," and some other works. n. in London; d. about 1635.

VERTOT, René Aubert de, voir'-to, an eminent French historian, who became a Capuchin, but afterwards quitted that order, and entered among the canons regular of the Premonstrant abbey at Valsery. In 1705 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Belles-Lettres, and in 1715 was appointed historiographer of the order of Malta. His most important works are, "History of the Revolutions of Portugal;" "The Revolutions of Sweden;" "History of the Roman Revolutions;" "Origin of the Grandeur of the Court of Rome;" and a critical history of the establishment of the Britons among the Gauls. n. in Normandy, 1655; d. at Paris, 1735.

VERTUE, George, ver'-chue, an eminent English engraver and antiquary, who was employed by Sir Godfrey Kneller, Jervas, Richardson, and other artists, to engrave portraits after their paintings. Appointed engraver to the Society of Antiquaries in 1717, he became acquainted with Heneage Finch, earl of Winchelsea, and other noblemen, patrons of the arts, who belonged to that body, and by whom he was assisted in obtaining original portraits for his engravings. He wrote a work entitled "Anecdotes of Painting in England," which was left in manuscript, and afterwards published by Horace Walpole; and also engraved the portraits of scores of the most illustrious persons in English history. Walpole says of this distinguished antiquary, "No man living so bigoted to a vocation was ever so incapable of falsehood. He did not deal even in hypothesis—scarce in conjecture." n. in London, 1684; d. 1756.

VERUS, Lucius Cæcilius Commodus, ve'-rus, a Roman emperor, was the son of Ælius Verus and Domitia Lucilla, and adopted by Adrian. He commanded against the barbarians in the East, whom he defeated, and was honoured with a triumph. He was also admitted as an associate with Marcus Aurelius in the empire, from 161 to 169, at which latter date he died suddenly of apoplexy, while marching against the Marcomanni and Quadi. He was a prince of dissolute manners.

VESALIUS, Andreas, ve-sai'-li-us, an illustrious Flemish physician, who studied at Paris under James Sylvius, after which he taught anatomy with great reputation in several universities. The emperor Charles V., and Philip II. of Spain appointed him their chief physician; but, about 1564, having opened the body of a Spanish gentleman, and removing the heart, he, so ruins the story, found it quivering in his hand; the relatives of the deceased man reported him to the Inquisition, and, to expiate his offence, he was obliged to go on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. It is, however, more probable that his departure was owing to his having taken part in one of the plots so rife in Madrid about that time. On his return, his ship was lost on the island of Zante, where he perished either of starvation or fatigue. His great works upon medicine inaugurated a new era in the healing art. b. 1514; d. 1564.

VEPASTIAN, Titus Flavius, ves-pai'-si-an, a Roman emperor, who rose entirely by merit; and, having distinguished himself in Germany, as proconsul in Africa, and in Britain under Claudius, was rewarded with the consular dignity for his public services. Nero appointed him commander of three legions, with which he in two years subdued the revolted Jews. On the death of Vitellius in 69, he was proclaimed emperor by his army, and the choice was approved by the senate and the people. He reformed the abuses which prevailed in all departments of the state, introduced excellent regulations for the correction of public morals, embellished Rome with many fine structures,—among others, that of the amphitheatre, since known as the Coliseum; fortified the cities of the empire, and proved himself the father of the people. He was also a patron of men of learning, and discountenanced vice and immorality. Under his rule, Petilius Cerealis conquered the Treviri, Agricola was victorious in Britain, and his son Titus laid siege to and took Jerusalem. b. in the Sabine country, 9; d. 79.

VESUTCI, Amerigo, ves-poo'-che, an Italian, who, according to an account first published in Lorraine in 1507, went upon four voyages; two at the command of the king of Castile, and two at that of the Portuguese monarch. This narrative, which was produced without his concurrence, declared that, in his first voyage, made in 1497, he discovered the northern shores of South America; but Humboldt proves this date to be a mistake for 1499; also, that as Columbus had reached the mouth of the Orinoco in 1498, he was in reality the discoverer. Humboldt further shows that the application of Amerigo's name to the newly-discovered country was made through ignorance. He subsequently became pilot-major of the Spanish navy, and remained the friend of Columbus until the death of that great navigator. b. at Florence, 1451; d. at Seville, 1512.

VESTRIS, Gaetano Apollino Balthazar, ves'-tris, a celebrated Italian dancer, who became the greatest performer of his day, and was surnamed "the god of dancing." His vanity was even greater than his reputation. He was in the habit of saying, "There are only three great men in Europe: myself, Voltaire, and the king of Prussia" (Frederick the Great.) b. at Florence, 1729; d. 1808.—His natural son, Marie Augustin Vestris, also became celebrated as a dancer.—The English actress, Madame Vestris, was connected with this family by marriage. b. 1856.

VEZIORE, Pietro, veit'-to-re, a learned Italian, who participated in the republican rising which resulted in the expulsion of the Medici from Florence in 1527; and when a scion of that family was created duke and ruler of that city by Charles V., Vettori retired into private life, but was afterwards recalled to his native city, and appointed professor of Latin and Greek. One of the most learned men of his age, he edited the works of Cicero, Terence, and Æschylus, wrote commentaries upon Aristotle, and produced some original poems in Italian. b. at Florence, 1480; d. at the same city, 1585.

VIARDOT, Louis, ve-ar'-do, a modern French litterateur, who was educated for the legal profession, but relinquished it for literature. In 1838 he was appointed a director at the Italian Opera-house of Paris; and under his management Signor Mario and Mademoiselle Pauline Garcia made their début. The last-named lady, one of the most talented novelists of her time, became his wife, and he accompanied her in her professional visits to Spain, Germany, and England. His principal works were, "Studies in the History, Administration, and Literature of Spain," "The Museums of Spain, England, and Belgium," and "History of the Moors in Spain." He also translated some of the works of the Russian authors, Nicholas Gogol and Alexander Pushkin, into French. b. at Dijon, 1800.

VICARS, John, vik'-ars, an English writer, who became usher of the school in Christ's Hospital, and distinguished himself in the civil wars as a zealous Presbyterian. He wrote a poem entitled "God in the Mount; or, England's Remembrancer;" "Looking-Glass for Malignants;" and other pamphlets against the royalists. Butler mentions him as "being inspired with ale or viler liquors." b. in London, about 1600; d. 1652.

VICARY, Thomas, vik'-a-re, an eminent English surgeon, and one of the first who wrote upon anatomy in the English language, was serjeant-surgeon to Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary I., and Elizabeth, and also chief surgeon of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. His book is entitled "A Treasure for Englishmen, containing the Anatomy of Man's Bodie," first published in 1543.

VICO, John Baptist, ve'-ko, a learned Italian writer, who became professor of rhetoric in the university of Naples. His principal work is entitled "Principles of a New Science," wherein he declares that the history of mankind is regulated by laws as fixed and regular in their operation as those which determine the operations of the material world. b. at Naples, 1668; d. at the same city, 1744.

VICQ-D'AZYR, Felix, vik'-da-zeer, an eminent French physician and naturalist, who became perpetual secretary of the Royal Society of Medicine, 1776, and was afterwards chosen to succeed Buffon as member of the French Academy. He was also chief physician to Queen Marie Antoinette; but, in order to preserve his life, he pretended to embrace the views of the Revolutionists. His principal works were—several learned anatomical treatises upon the brain, ear, on the organ of speech, and upon anatomy and physiology. b. at Valogne, 1748; d. 1794.

VICTOR I., vic'-tor, was elected pope in succession to Eleutherius, about 190. He was engaged in a controversy with the churches of Asia, relative to the correct period of the Easter festival. b. in Africa; d. about 202.

VICTOR II. succeeded Leo IX. in 1055. He had previously been bishop of Eichstadt, and counsellor to Henry III. of Germany. He reformed many abuses in the Church, which were condemned at the council of Florence. The council of Lyons against simony, that of Rouen enforcing celibacy among the priesthood, and that of Narbonne excommunicating those who usurped the possessions of the Church, were also convoked by him. His successor was Stephen IX. b. at Florence, 1057.

VICTOR III. was the successor of Gregory VII. Guibert, the antipope, was supported by the army of Henry IV., and Victor renounced the pontifical dignity, but was induced to resume it in 1087. By the assistance of the Roman nobility and the duke of Apulia, he expelled the antipope from Rome. Henry IV. having declared that he would invade Rome if Victor were not deposed, the senators forced the pope to evacuate the Vatican. He retired to Monte Casino, and died there in 1087.

VICTOR IV., an antipope, whose usurpation was supported by Frederick I., and some of the cardinals. This gave rise to a schism in the Romish church. b. 1161.

VICTOR, Sr., of Marseilles, had served in the army of the emperor Maximian; but, having embraced Christianity, suffered martyrdom about 303.

VICTOR, Sr., Adam of, a celebrated hymnologist who flourished in the 12th century, and is supposed to have been a native of England. After passing some time at Paris, he entered the monastery of St. Victor, where Thomas a Becket resided during his retirement from England. b. about 1192.

VICTOR, Claude Perrin, Duke of Belluno, and marshal of France, enlisted as a private soldier in an artillery regiment in 1781, and at the outbreak of the revolutionary wars, having greatly distinguished himself, was created chef-de-bataillon, in which capacity he served, in 1793, at the siege of Toulon, where he commanded the party that captured Fort l'Aiguillette. Promoted to the rank of general of brigade, he was sent to the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, where, as subsequently in Italy, he exhibited great bravery and skill. Attracting the notice of Bonaparte, he was appointed second in command to Lannes in the campaign in the Papal States. His next important command was in La Vendée, which country he, by his skilful policy, succeeded in restoring to tranquillity. Recalled to the army of Italy, he gained fresh renown by his conduct while covering the retreat of the French army of Naples at Marengo and at Bassano. At the peace of Amiens he was appointed by Napoleon ambassador to the court of Denmark; but upon the commencement of the war with Prussia, in 1806, he was recalled to his military duties. At Jena he particularly distinguished himself, as also at Pultusk; while at the battle of Friedland his valour was so conspicuous, that Napoleon created him, upon the spot, marshal of France. In 1807 he held the governorship of Berlin. In the following year he was sent to Spain in command of the first corps of the French army, and, after twice defeating the Spaniards, was sent to co-operate with Soult in Portugal. He, however, suffered a defeat at Talavera, and, in 1812, was recalled from the Peninsula to take a command in the grand army about to invade Russia. In that terrible campaign his valour was conspicuous; and at the passage of the Beresina, he held in check the pursuing Russians, and saved a large number of his fellow-soldiers, who would otherwise have fallen into the power of the enemy. During the campaign of 1813, he evinced his accustomed bravery and skill, in checking, as far as possible, the advance of the allies into France; but having failed to dislodge the enemy at Montereau, he incurred the displeasure of the emperor, who took from him his command. This act of injustice deeply moved the brave marshal, who declared that he would not quit the army, and, as he had already served as a private soldier, he would again take his place in the ranks. Napoleon, appreciating his fidelity, gave him the command of a portion of the guard, with which he fought, with the most stubborn courage, at the battle of Craonne, and was carried off the field severely wounded. After the abdication of the emperor, he gave his adherence to the Bourbons, and was appointed to a command. He subsequently evinced much bitterness against Napoleon and Marshal Ney, and refusing to follow the example of most of the other captains of Napoleon, by re-joining his standard after the return from Elba, he retired, with Louis XVIII., to Ghent. In 1821 he became minister of war, and, in 1823, acted as second in command in the Spanish campaign. After the Revolution of 1830 he became one of the leaders of the legitimist party; but took little part in public affairs. One of the bravest commanders of the Imperial armies, his fame was principally owing to the bold and able manner in which he executed manœuvres set down for him by a higher authority. He usually failed when holding an independent command. His treatment of the sick and wounded English soldiers in the town of Talavera reflects great credit upon his humanity. b. at La Manche, 1766; d. 1841.

VICTOR AMADEUS I., a-nat'-de-us, Duke of Savoy, was brought up at the Spanish court, whence, in 1614, his father recalled him, to assist in the campaign against France. He succeeded his father in the dukedom of Savoy in 1630, and in the following year obtained Montferrato and Alba. He was compelled by Cardinal Richelieu to become the ally of France against the Spaniards, over whom he obtained several advantages. His wife was the daughter of Henry IV. of France. He built the university of Turin, and provided it with several distinguished professors. b. at Turin, 1587; d. 1647.

VICTOR AMADEUS I., the first king of Sardinia, succeeded his father as duke of Savoy in 1675. He joined Spain and Austria against France; on which Marshal Catinat was sent against him, and the French gaining a great victory at Staffarda, nearly subdued the whole of Savoy. Victor-Amadeus, on the other hand, entered Dauphiny, and made himself master of some strong places, which, however, he was obliged to abandon, and to sue for peace. In 1701 he again engaged in hostilities with France, having been promised by the emperor a considerable accession of territory. The duke de Vendôme took possession of a considerable part of Savoy, and the French laid siege to Turin, which was relieved by Prince Eugene. In 1713 Victor recovered the whole of his territory, and was, by the treaty of London, acknowledged king of Sardinia. In 1730 he abdicated the throne to his son; but, repenting of what he had done, endeavoured to recover the crown. In this, however, he failed, and after remaining during some time under arrest, was compelled to retire to his private residence at Moncalieri. He was famous both as a general and statesman; he gave an impulse to trade and manufactures in his dominions; encouraged the cultivation of the mulberry-tree and the breeding of silkworms; thus laying the foundation of that branch of commerce in Piedmont. By his marriage with Anna Maria of Orleans, daughter of Henrietta Maria, wife of Philip, duke of Orleans, and granddaughter of Charles I., the house of Savoy became connected with the royal family of England. b. 1666; d. 1732.

VICTOR-AMADEUS II., succeeded his father Carlo Emmanuel I., in 1773. During the wars of the French Revolution, he lost Savoy and Nice, and was compelled by Napoleon I. to become the vassal of France. b. 1726; d. 1794.

VICTOR AURELIUS. (See AURELIUS, Victor).

VICTOR EMMANUEL I., c-mā-nu-el, king of Sardinia. As duke of Aosta he opposed an energetic resistance to the French revolutionary armies; and, upon his father, Victor Amadeus II., concluding a treaty of peace in 1796 with Bonaparte, he withheld his acknowledgment of it, and retired to the island of Sardinia. When his brother, Carlo Emmanuel II., abdicated in 1802, he succeeded to the crown. By the treaty of Paris, in 1814, Nice and a moiety of Savoy were restored to him. The remaining portions of Savoy and Genoa were subsequently added to his dominions. He persistently refused to grant a constitution to his subjects, and in 1821 a revolution burst forth, in consequence of which he was compelled to abdicate. He was succeeded by his brother Carlo Felix. b. 1759 d. at Moncagliero, 1824.

VICTOR EMMANUEL II. (I. of Italy) was the son of Carlo-Alberto, and fought in the campaign against the Austrians, which, terminating in the disastrous battle of Novara, caused his father to abdicate. He became king in 1849, under the most unfavourable circumstances. He had to avert the consequences of a disastrous war, to allay faction, and to preserve the constitution, to annul which, it is stated Austria attempted to bribe him with the offer of Parma. After securing the services of eminent statesmen, and chiefly of the illustrious Cavour, he undertook the complete organization of the finances, the army, the system of public education; concluded with England a treaty of commerce, and obtained a treaty of peace from Austria upon comparatively easy terms. Although threatened with excommunication by Rome, he persevered in granting the blessings of religious liberty throughout his dominions. In 1855 his monarchy acquired additional consideration in consequence of the convention signed with England and France, by which his troops became the comrades of the allied armies in the Crimea. At the battle of the Tchernaya the Sardinian soldiers behaved with the greatest bravery, and it became generally known that the military organization of Sardinia was of the most complete character. In 1855 he paid a visit to the English court, and received an enthusiastic reception from the English people. His daughter, the Princess Clothilde, was given in marriage to Prince Napoleon, cousin of the emperor of the French. In 1859, after a series of sanguinary engagements, in which the Austrians were defeated by the allied French and Sardinian troops, and in which the bravery of Victor-Emmanuel was conspicuous, the Austrians were driven from Lombardy, which state was annexed to the Sardinian crown. In 1860 the grand-duchy of Tuscany, the duchy of Parma, and other important states of the Italian peninsula, voted for their annexation to the territories acknowledging the sway of the Sardinian monarch. Sicily, Naples, as well as several provinces of the Papal States, also rose against their tyrannical masters, and these fair countries were enabled, principally through the courageous conduct of the patriot Garibaldi, to become an integral portion of that constitutional monarchy which, with Victor-Emmanuel II. at its head, may eventually include the whole of the Italian peninsula, from "the Alps to the Adriatic." After the annexation of these provinces to his crown, Victor-Emmanuel assumed the title of King of Italy, a designation which was generally acknowledged by the other powers of Europe. In 1866, after the "Seven Weeks War," Venice was added to the Italian dominions. b. 1820.

VICTORIA ALEXANDRINA, queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,

Louisa Victoria, of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld. At the death of her father, in 1820, the duchess of Kent, whose first husband had been the Prince of Leiningen, and who was the sister of Leopold king of the Belgians, devoted herself to superintending the education of the future queen. "From the earliest age," says a standard work on biography, "the young princess was taught to seek health by exercise and temperance; to acquire fearlessness even from her amusements, such as riding and sailing; to practise a wise economy, united to a discriminating charity; to cultivate a self-reliance that should render her independent of and superior to mere favourites and flatterers." She became accomplished in music and languages; a knowledge of the sciences, particularly botany, was afforded her; while a complete acquaintance with the principles of the English constitution was obtained by her under the tutelage of Viscount Melbourne. On June 20, 1837, she ascended the throne of the United Kingdom, the duke of Cumberland becoming king of Hanover, in virtue of the law which excludes females from that throne. By this act, the connexion between the crowns of England and Hanover was brought to a termination, after having existed during 123 years. On February 10, 1840, the queen became the wife of Prince Albert-Franz-August-Karl-Emmanuel, second son of the duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. On November 21st of the same year was born the Princess Royal, afterwards married to Prince Frederick William of Prussia. The birthdays of the other children of her Majesty are,—November 9, 1841, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, who in 1863 married the Princess Alexandra of Denmark; April 25, 1843, Alice Maud Mary, married in 1862 to Prince Louis of Hesse; August 6, 1844, Alfred Ernest Albert; May 25, 1846, Helena Augusta Victoria; March 18, 1848, Louise Caroline Alberta; May 1, 1850, Arthur William Patrick Albert; April 7, 1853, Leopold George Duncan Albert; April 15, 1857, Beatrice Mary Victoria Feodora. In December, 1861, her Majesty lost her consort, Prince Albert; and till the marriage of the Prince of Wales, in March, 1863, remained in almost total seclusion. She subsequently gratified the people, who entertained for her a most profound respect and affection, by again appearing in public. b. at Kensington Palace, May 24, 1819.

VICTORINA, vik-to-re-na, a celebrated matron, who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grandson, of the same name, were declared emperors; it, when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the Imperial purple one of her favourites, called Tetricus. She was poisoned in 269, according to some, by Tetricus himself.

lecting and explaining the ancient Greek and Latin writers, particularly Cicero. He was professor of rhetoric, and member of the senate at Florence. b. at Florence, 1499; d. 1555.

VIDA, Marco Girolamo, ve-da, an eminent Italian writer, who, entering into orders, went to Rome, where he was in great favour with Leo X. In 1532 Clement VII., as a reward for a poem dedicated to him, created him bishop of Alba. He wrote, among other works, "The Art of Poetry," a poem of great merit; a poem on Versification, another one entitled "Scacchia Ludus," and a "Life of Christ," in verse. b. at Cremona, 1490; d. at Alba, 1566.

VROOCQ, François-Jules, ve-dok, a notorious French detective officer, who was the son of a baker, whom he assisted in the business until his 13th year, when he commenced pilfering the stock, money, and silver forks and spoons. Detected in these acts, he was sent to prison, and while there he, with another boy-prisoner, planned a more extensive robbery of his parent's property. Shortly after his release, he abstracted the whole contents of the family cash-box, amounting to £30, which he shared with his companion, and started off from his native town for Ostend, with the intention of taking a passage in a vessel bound for America; but, falling in with a sharper, he lost the whole of his ill-acquired money. Thus reduced to a destitute condition, he entered the service of the proprietor of a travelling menagerie, who at first employed him in attending to the animals, and afterwards as an acrobat. He was, however, discharged from this situation in consequence of his refusal to perform the part of a savage who was to devour raw flesh. He next found a master in the keeper of a puppet-show, whom he quitted to assist an itinerant quack doctor. He led this vagrant life during two years, when, through the kind offices of an old priest, he was allowed to return to his father's roof. Unable to remain long at the regular work of his father's business, he enlisted in the army, saw some service, was made a corporal, but having quarrelled with and challenged the drum-major of the regiment, he, to avoid the consequences, deserted, and entered another regiment, with which he was present at the battle of Gemappes. Again deserting, he went over to the Austrians, but afterwards contrived to re-enter France. For the third time he became a soldier, and being wounded, was sent to his native place. He there married, left his wife almost immediately afterwards, became a gambler at Brussels, made love to and gained the affections of a countess, and was on the eve of being married to her, when, confessing that he already had a wife, he was rewarded for this, perhaps his first honest act, with a large sum of money; whereupon he repaired to Paris. But his gains were soon dissipated at the gambling-table, and, after a variety of strange adventures, he found himself convicted of forgery, and sentenced to eight years' penal servitude at the galleys. In the 6th year he effected his escape, obtained employment as an usher in a school, was recaptured, sent to Toulon, and again got free. Highway robbery and the betrayal of his companions to justice were the next steps in his career, which had now reached its turning point; for, after supporting himself during a few years as a toy-maker, or as a tailor, he applied for employment at the office of the commissioner of secret police in Paris, and, by dint of renewed solicitations, obtained a place as informer. By his means some of the most desperate gangs of robbers in the French capital were brought to justice; and so greatly had he distinguished himself in his new calling, that, about 1813, he was placed at the head of a company of secret police. He held this office until the year 1825, when he turned paper-maker, and commenced writing his memoirs. In 1831 he established a secret inquiry office, to assist trade and commerce by ascertaining the solvency of business people. He produced his memoirs under the title of the "True Mysteries of Paris," in 1811; and shortly afterwards repaired to London, where he opened an exhibition of the implements used by French burglars, a speculation which proved a failure. Thereupon he retired to Belgium. b. at Arras, 1775; d. in Belgium, 1850.

VIGENERE, Blaise de, veezh-nair, a learned French writer, who became secretary to the duke de Nevers, and subsequently held a post in the French embassy at Rome. He translated into French, Caesar, Livy, and other Greek and Latin authors. He was likewise the first to give a French version of Passo. b. at Saint-Pourçain, France, 1523; d. 1592.

VIGILIUS, ve-jil-i-us, an African prelate and polemical writer, who flourished about 431.

VIGILUS, Pope, a Roman, who, in 527, obtained that dignity from Theodora, wife of Justinian, on a promise to revoke the acts of the Council of Constantinople against the Eutychian bishops. He afterwards published a condemnation of that sect, for which he was persecuted and banished. His successor was Pelagius I. b. at Syracuse, 555.

VIGNOLA, Giacomo Barozzi, veen-yo-la, a celebrated Italian architect, who studied at Rome, and afterwards visited France, whence, after a two years' residence, he returned to Rome. He was subsequently employed by Pope Julius III. upon some great works, and, after the pontiff's death, obtained a patron in his nephew, Cardinal Farnese, for whom he designed the superb palace at Caprarola. He was invited to Spain by Philip II., who sought his advice as to the construction of the Escorial, but Vignola declined the offer. He wrote a celebrated treatise on the Five Orders of Architecture. b. at Vignola, Modena, 1507; d. at Rome, 1573.

VIGORIS, Stephen de, veen-yole, better known by the name of De la Hire, a French military commander, who signalized himself in the wars of Charles VII. He forced the duk-of Bedford to raise the siege of Montargis, and accompanied Jeanne Darc to the relief of Orleans, whereby he contributed to the re-establishing of Charles on his throne. p. 1447.

VIGORZUS, Alphonse des, a French Protestant divine and historical writer, who came of an ancient family of Languedoc. After completing his education at Geneva, he repaired to England, where he resided for some time, but returned to his native country in 1675. Upon the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, ten years subsequently, he went first to Geneva, and afterwards to Berlin, where he became pastor of a congregation. He was one of the original members of the Royal Society of Berlin, to whose "Memoirs" he contributed some learned papers. His most important work was "A Chronology of Sacred History, from the departure from Egypt to the captivity at Babylon," a work of great research, to which he devoted his life. p. in France, 1649; p. 1744.

VIGNY, Alfred Count de, veel'-ye, a modern French poet and novelist, who, at the Restoration, entered upon a military career, and, in 1823, was quartered in the Pyrenees, but did not take any active part in the Spanish campaign of that date. Shortly after his marriage with an English lady in 1825, he retired from the army, and henceforth devoted himself to literature, producing a number of graceful poetical works, and a novel, "Cinq Mars," of great merit. He also made translations of "Othello" and the "Merchant of Venice," of Shakspeare. p. at Louhes, 1799; p. 1863.

VILLALPANDUS, John Baptist, vil'-lal-pän'-dus, a Spanish divine, who distinguished himself by a learned commentary on Ezekiel. In this work there is a very curious and exact description of the city of Jerusalem. He was also the author of an exposition of St. Paul's epistles. p. 1603.

VILLARET, Claude, vil'-la-räi, a French historical writer, who was for some time an actor, but quitted the stage for a literary career in 1750. He wrote a continuation of Velly's "History of France;" a treatise on the "Dramatic Art;" and a tract on the wit of Voltaire. p. about 1715; p. 1766.

VILLARS, Louis Hector, vil'-lärs, a celebrated French general, who became marshal of France, and grandee of Spain. While serving under Louis XIV., he attracted the favourable notice of that monarch, and, in his 19th year, was appointed to command a troop of cavalry. After distinguishing himself on various occasions in the army, he was made maréchal-de-camp in 1690, and was sent to the Cévennes, where, by his humane and lenient measures, he succeeded in restoring tranquillity. He next served against Marlborough, by whom he was defeated at Ramillies, and again at Malplaquet, where he was dangerously wounded. He was appointed plenipotentiary for concluding a peace at Rastadt, in 1714. In 1738 he was sent into Italy, where he took Pizzighetone, but soon afterward asked and was permitted to return to France p. 1653; p. 1734.

VILLEHARDUIN, Geoffroy de, veel'-har'-doo (h), a French historian, who was maréchal of Champagne under Thibaut V., count of Champagne and Bré. He distinguished himself in 1109, in the fourth crusade; was present at the taking of Constantinople in 1204; and was created maréchal of Romania by the emperor Baldwin I. The emperor Henry gave him the city of Messinopolis, and his descendants, during two centuries, ruled over principalities in Greece. He wrote the "History of the taking of Constantinople by the French and Venetians," a narrative as curious as it is ancient. An edition of this old work was published, with learned notes, by Du Cange, p. near Areis-sur-Aube, 1167; p. in Thessaly, about 1213.

VILLEMARIN, Abel François, veel'-mä(h), an eminent modern French historical writer and statesman, who so early distinguished himself as a scholar, as to gain the appointment of professor of rhetoric at the Collège Charlemagne in his 19th year. In 1816 he became assistant professor of modern history in the university of Paris. In 1833 he was created a peer of France, and, in the Guizot ministry, acted as minister of public instruction. In 1834 he was nominated perpetual secretary of the Academy. He retired into private life after the Revolution of 1848. His principal works were,—a translation of Pindar into French; "Lasearis, or, the Greeks of the Fifteenth Century;" "Course of French Literature;" "History of Cromwell;" an edition of the "Provincial Letters" of Pascal; a translation of "The School for Course on the Advantages and Disadvantages of Criticism." p. at Paris, 1791; p. 1867.

VILLENA, Marquis of, vil'-ai'-na, a Spanish poet, who was of the royal house of Aragon. His best production was entitled the "Gaya Ciencia," in which he describes the ceremonies of the Troubadours. His translation of Dante into prose was much esteemed. p. 1384; p. 1434.

VILLENEUVE, Gabrielle Susanna Barrot de, veel'-nu(r)-ve, a French authoress, who wrote the "Young American," the "Conjugal Phoenix," the "Fair Hermits," and some other novels, an abridgment of one of which is the celebrated "Beauty and the Beast." p. about 1690; p. 1755.

VILLENEUVE, Christopher, a brave French nobleman, who in early life fought under Claude de Savoy against the Huguenots. He was commissioned by the Count de Carces to proceed to Paris for the purpose of dissuading the king from ordering a massacre of the Huguenots in Provence on St. Bartholomew. He succeeded in obtaining from the king a countermand of his previous order for the massacre, and, having outriden the previous messenger, saved the city. He afterwards distinguished himself under Henry III., Henry IV., and Louis XIII. p. 1541; p. 1615.

VILLENEUVE, Pierre Charles Jean Baptiste, a brave French admiral, who held a command at the battle of the Nile, where the vessels of his nation were totally defeated by Nelson. In 1805 he was appointed to the command of a French fleet, with which he encountered an English squadron under Sir Robert Calder, off Cape Finisterre; but, after fighting for a whole day, both admirals went off without renewing the action. He shortly afterwards again met the English fleet under Nelson, by whom his squadron, and that of the Spanish under Gravina, were annihilated at Trafalgar. He was taken prisoner, and, after being detained in England until the following year, returned to France, where, expecting to be disgraced by the emperor Napoleon I., he killed himself.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Villoison

VILLOISON, Jean Baptiste Gaspard de, veel'-voi-sauv, an eminent French scholar, who evinced an extraordinary aptitude for the acquisition of knowledge; and, by the time he had reached his 15th year, had read nearly the whole of the Greek writers. Before his 22nd year he produced an edition of Apollonius's Lexicon of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey." His name became known throughout Europe as a marvel of learning. In 1778 he was sent, at the expense of the French government, to make researches in the library of St. Mark at Venice, where, among other valuable manuscripts, he discovered one of the "Iliad" of Homer. During the revolutionary period, he lost all his property; but was afterwards nominated professor of ancient and modern Greek in the Collège de France by Napoleon I. He left in manuscript a work upon Greece, in 15 volumes; also remarks upon Tournefort's "Travels in Greece," and upon Montfaucon. b. 1750; d. at Paris, 1805.

VINCE, Samuel, vin'-ce, an eminent English mathematician, who became professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy in the university of Cambridge. Having taken orders, he was also presented to the archdeaconry of Bedford. He furnished the "Philosophical Transactions" with several papers of great importance; such as "Observations on the Theory of the Motion and Resistance of Fluids," and "Experiments on the Resistance of Bodies moving in Fluids." He was also the author of "The Credibility of Christianity Vindicated;" "Observations on the Hypotheses which have been assumed to account for the causes of Gravitation on Mechanical Principles;" "Principles of Hydrostatics;" and "Elements of Astronomy." b. in Suffolk; d. 1821.

VINCENT, Thomas, vin'-cent, a pious English divine, who, when the plague raged in London, remained in the city, and preached regularly to the inhabitants in that awful season. He wrote "God's Terrible Voice in the City by Plague and Fire," and other religious works. b. 1634; d. 1678.

VINCENT, John Jervis, Earl Saint, a distinguished English admiral, who commenced his career aloft in his 10th year. He participated in the battle gained by Keppel, in 1778; in the relief of Gibraltar, under Lord Howe; and in 1782 held the command of the expedition which captured Guadaloupe, St. Lucia, and Martinique. In 1795 he was made admiral of the Blue, and placed in command of the Mediterranean fleet, with which he defeated the combined French and Spanish fleets off Cape St. Vincent,—a victory which was chiefly owing to the skill and daring of Nelson, then captain of a 74-gun ship. For this service Jervis was raised to the peerage, with the title of Earl Saint Vincent. He subsequently took the command of the Channel fleet, and was, during the Pitt administration, first lord of the admiralty, in which office he distinguished himself as a reformer of old abuses in the naval administration. At the coronation of George IV. in 1821, he was nominated admiral of the fleet. There is a monument to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral. b. in Staffordshire, 1734; d. 1823.

VINCENT DE PAUL, St., an eminent divine of the Roman Catholic church, who devoted his life to philanthropic duties. He collected large sums from the rich and noble, which he distributed amongst the poor and sick; established the order of Sisters of Charity, several hospitals in Paris, and caused missionaries to be sent abroad. b. near the Pyrenees, 1576; d. 1660.

VINCI, Leonardo da, veen'-che, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and engineer. Verrochio was his master, whom he soon excelled, as he did all the painters of his time. One of his greatest works was a picture of "The Lord's Supper," at Milan, in which city he founded his celebrated school of painting. He was also an excellent architect, and constructed the famous aqueduct which supplies Milan with water. From Milan he went to Florence, where he laboured with Michael Angelo in ornamenting the grand council-chamber. At the invitation of Francis I., he visited the French court, and is said to have died in the arms of that monarch. He wrote a "Treatise on Painting," in Italian, folio, and some other works, of which Itallum thus speaks:—"The discoveries which made Galilæe, and Kepler, and other names illustrious, the system of Copernicus, the very theories of recent geologists, are anticipated by Da Vinci within the compass of a very few pages. . . . He first laid down the grand principle of Bacon,—that experiment and observation must be the guide to just theory." b. near Florence, 1452; d. at Clux, near Amboise, 1519.

VINER, Charles, vi'-ner, celebrated as the

during half a century, and was printed at his own house. He bequeathed about £12,000 to the university of Oxford, to found professorships and fellowships of common law there. The first who held the Vinerian professorship was Blackstone. b. at Aldershot, 1680; d. 1756.

VINET, Alexandre Rodolph, ve'-nai, a learned Swiss theologian, who became professor of French literature at Bâle, and afterwards at Lausanne. An influential pastor of the Protestant church of Switzerland, he produced a number of works of great authority. These principally were,—"Memoir in Favour of Liberty of Religion," "Vital Christianity," "Pastoral Theology," and "History of the French Literature of the Eighteenth Century." b. at Lausanne, 1797; d. 1817.

VIOTTI, Giovanni Battista, ve-ot'-te, a celebrated Italian violinist, who enjoyed a brilliant reputation in Italy, at Berlin, and at Paris, which latter city he quitted when the Reign of Terror began. He repaired to England, and there, during many years, enjoyed great celebrity. b. at Fontanetto, Piedmont, 1755; d. at Brighton, 1824.

VIREX, Julien Joseph, va'-re, an eminent French writer upon natural history and medicine, in early life was an assistant in an apothecary's shop, but afterwards joined the republican armies; and acquiring, during war and at the hospitals at Strasburg and Paris, considerable skill, both theoretically and practically, as a surgeon, he resolved to devote himself to the composition of works upon medicine. About 1801 he was appointed editor of the "Journal de Pharmacie," and subsequently obtained his diploma as physician. He was the principal contributor to the "Dictionnaire des Sciences Médicales." From a long list of valuable works which emanated from him, may be quoted, "Treatise on the Theory and Practice of Pharmacy;" "Natural History of the Human Species;" "Hygienic Philosophy;" "Of Vital Force;" "Natural History of Animals, their Habits and Instincts;" and "An Impartial Examination of Magnetic Medicine." n. at Hories, France, 1775; n. at Paris, 1840.

VIRGIL, Publius Maro, vir'-jil, an illustrious Roman poet, whose earliest years were spent at Cremona; whence he removed to Rome, when his estates were partitioned out among the soldiers after the battle of Philippi. There, by means of his friend Mæcenas, he was introduced to Augustus, who restored to him his property. On this occasion he wrote his first "Eclogue;" and, on completing the "Dacolics," he undertook the "Georgics." After these, he commenced the "Æneid," at the request of the emperor Augustus. This great poem is composed upon the model of the "Iliad," and relates the adventures of Æneas after the destruction of Troy. The poet was engaged during eleven years upon this immortal work, but died without revising it. He left the greatest part of his property to Mæcenas, Tucca, and Augustus. His remains were interred on the road leading from Naples to Puteoli, and this epitaph, said to have been composed by himself, was inscribed on his tomb:—Mantua me genuit; Calabri rapuerunt; tenet nunc Parthæopis; ecce in præceps, rura, duces. ("My birthplace Mantua; in Calabria death overtook me; in Naples now I lie. I've sung of shepherds, fields, and heroes' deeds.") A competent authority declares that, "though the 'Æneid' contains many fine passages, its poetical merits are greatly below the 'Iliad' and 'Odyssey' . . . and it is deficient in the truth and simplicity which so eminently characterize those poems." The best editions of Virgil are those of Heyne and Wagner, Leipzig, 1812, Forbiger, and Robert Stephens. His works have been translated into English by Dryden, Pitt, Warton, and John Ogilby. There is also a translation into Scottish verse, by Gavin Douglas, v. near Mantua, 70 B.C.; D. at Brundisium, 49 B.C.

VIRGINIA, vir'-jin'-e-a, daughter of the centurion L. Virginius, was a Roman virgin of great beauty. The decemvir Appius Claudius becoming enamoured of her charms, he, to obtain possession of her person, induced M. Clandius, one of his clients, to claim her as the daughter of his slave, when Appius, as judge, ordered her to be delivered into his hands. Virginius, who was with the army at Mount Algidus, being informed of his daughter's danger, hastened to Rome, and on finding that he could not save her from Claudius, he, in the presence of Appius and the Roman people, plunged a knife into his daughter's bosom. He then returned to the camp, where he harangued the soldiers, who instantly marched to Rome. Appius destroyed himself in prison, and the office of decemvir was abolished, B.C. 419. This affecting story has furnished the theme of a beautiful lay by Macaulay, and has been employed as the foundation of one of the best plays of Sheridan Knowles. Alfieri, Lessing, and others, have also made use of the romantic episode.

VIRIATHUS, vir'-e-a'-thus a Lusitanian chief, who repeatedly defeated the Roman armies, and for fourteen years successfully defended his country and a part of Spain. He was at last murdered by his servants, who had been bribed by Cæsar, the Roman general, B.C. 140.

VISCHER, Cornelius, vis'-ker, an eminent Dutch engraver, whose mode of working, Strutt says, "was as singular as the effect he produced was picturesque and beautiful." His brothers, and other members of his family, were also celebrated as engravers. n. at Huerlem, 1610; d. about 1660.

VISCHER, Peter, an eminent German sculptor, who studied in Italy. His principal production was the tomb of St. Sebald, in the church at Nuremberg, a very fine work. Lived in the 15th century.

VISCONTI, vis-kon'-te, an illustrious family of Lombardy. The most celebrated of the name were:—

VISCONTI, Otho, who was nominated archbishop of Milan in 1262; but the leader of the city, Martino della Torre, forbade the new prelate to enter upon his duties; upon which Pope Urban IV. excommunicated the city. The archbishop subsequently gathered together a large number of adherents, with whom he marched upon Milan, and having defeated the party of Della Torre, entered the city in triumph. In 1293 he resigned the temporal government of the city to his nephew Matteo Visconti. d. 1295.

VISCONTI, Matteo, nephew of the preceding, was in 1288 elected "captain of the people." He afterwards acquired Bergamo, Lodi, Cremona, and other places, and upon the death of Archbishop Otho, was acknowledged perpetual lord of Milan. He was for a period dispossessed of his territories, but ultimately regained them. In 1322 he abdicated in favour of his son Galeazzo, and retired to a monastery, where he died in the same year.

VISCONTI, Galeazzo, was eldest son of the preceding, and became ruler of Milan upon the abdication of his father in 1322; but was in the same year driven from the city by the Guelph faction. He was, however, acknowledged as imperial vicar of Milan, Pavia, and Vercelli, by Louis of Bavaria, who had obtained the iron crown of Lombardy; but almost immediately afterwards, Louis caused him, with his son Azzo, and two brothers, to be cast into the prison of Monza, where the Visconti endured a confinement of eight months. Their liberation was due to Castruccio Castracani, lord of Lucca, who enjoyed the especial favour of Louis. This last-named prince having been crowned emperor of Rome, sold to Azzo Visconti the imperial vicariate of Milan, for 60,000 crowns. Galeazzo died in exile, in 1329.

VISCONTI, Azzo, son of the preceding, was the ruler of Milan during eleven years. He restored and embellished the city, employing, among other celebrated artists, Giotto of Florence. He was the first ruler of Milan who issued a coinage. At his decease, almost the whole of the citizens put on mourning. d. 1339.

VISCONTI, Luchino, was the uncle and successor of the preceding. He added to his lordship the greater portion of Lombardy and Monferrato, encouraged the manufacture of silks and the cultivation of the vine; but his good qualities were marred by his immoral course of life. d. it is supposed of poison, 1349.

VISCONTI, Giovanni, brother of the preceding, at whose death he became sole lord of Milan, was in holy orders, and had previously been nominated archbishop. In 1350 he bought Bologna for 200,000 golden florins; but Pope Clement VI. laid claim to that territory, and, on Giovanni refusing to yield it, he was excommunicated. A compromise was, however, subsequently effected. In 1333 he sent assistance to the people of Genoa, who were besieged by the Venetians. He was the patron of the poet Petrarch. d. 1351.—His successors were his three nephews, Matteo, Galeazzo, and Barnabo, who ruled conjointly. Matteo died in the following year, poisoned by his brothers, it is supposed. Bologna was soon afterwards treacherously sold by its governor to the pope; upon which Barnabo sent his troops to regain it, but was defeated, and excommunicated by Innocent VI. In 1395 he was taken prisoner by stratagem, and confined in the castle of Trezzo by his nephew, Gian Galeazzo, who, upon the death of Barnabo in the same year, became lord of Milan. Ambitious of acquiring the sovereignty of Northern Italy, he captured Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Sienna, and other places, and made repeated attacks upon Florence, employing the most famous condottieri and the best-disciplined troops in Italy. In 1395 he purchased the dukedom of Milan from the emperor Wenceslas for 100,000 golden florins. He was crowned in the same year, and about the same time commenced the building of the cathedral. When Wenceslas was deposed by his vassal princes in 1400, and Robert became emperor, Gian Visconti was summoned to surrender his possessions, and a German army was sent against him. It was, however, defeated by the duke of Milan, who, after his success, was on the eve of declaring himself king of Italy, when he died of the plague while besieging Florence.—His eldest son, Giovanni Maria Visconti, succeeded him. He was cruel even to insanity, and delighted in the horrible spectacle of men and children being torn to pieces by dogs trained for the purpose. He was assassinated in 1412.—Filippo Maria Visconti, another son of Gian, succeeded to the dukedom of Milan. His general, Francesco Bussone, recovered Genoa, which had refused to acknowledge the lordship of the Visconti since 1356, and also captured Parma, Brescia, Lodi, and Bergamo. This distinguished commander was treated with ingratitude by the duke, and thereupon took service with the Venetians. In 1418 he caused his wife to be beheaded upon a false charge of infidelity, and henceforth lived with a Milanese woman, by whom he had a daughter, Bianca, who became the wife of Francesco Sforza, a military adventurer who had been sent against him, but whose alliance he thus purchased. (See Sforza, Francesco.) With Filippo Maria the great Visconti family ended. It ruled at Milan during the interval between 1288 and 1447.

VISCOCCI, Ennius Quirinus, a Roman archaeologist, was intended for the church; but having formed an attachment to a lady whom he wished to marry, he refused to enter into orders. His knowledge of archaeology was immense, and his general talents were of the highest order. He was appointed conservator of the Pio-Clementine museum; and when the French took possession of Rome, and established a provisional government in 1797, he was nominated minister of the interior. He afterwards retired to France, became a member of the Institute, professor of archaeology, and surveyor of the museum of antiquities. Among his works are, "Grecian Iconography," "Roman Iconography," and the "Description of the Pio-Clementine Museum." b. 1751; d. 1818.

VITELLIVS, Aulus, vi-tel'-li-us, a Roman emperor, who was born of an illustrious family, and insinuated himself into the favour of Tiberius by administering to his pleasures. He also gained the patronage of Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, through flattering their passions. The army he won over by rich gifts and unbounded promises. Thus he possessed himself of the highest offices of the state. He was proclaimed in 69 by the army in Germany, at the same time that Otho was invested with the purple. Three battles were fought between the rival emperors, which Vitellius lost; but in a fourth he was victorious. His conduct was so licentious and extravagant, that the people revolted, and placed Vespasian on the throne. Vitellius, after suffering all manner of indignities from the populace, was put to death, and his body thrown into the Tiber, in 69.

VITRINGA, Campegius, ve-tring'-a, a Dutch theologian, who became, in succession, professor of divinity, oriental literature, and sacred history, at Francker. He wrote a commentary on Isaiah and other parts of Scripture, in Latin. b. at Leeuwarden, 1659; d. 1722.—Campegius Vitringa, his son, wrote an abridgment of "Natural Theology." b. 1693; d. 1723.

VITRUVIUS, Marcus Vitruvius Pollio, vi-troo'-vi-us, a celebrated Roman architect, who was greatly esteemed by Julius Cæsar, and employed by Augustus in constructing public buildings, and appointed superintendent of warlike machines. He wrote a valuable treatise on architecture, the best edition of which is that of Schneider, Leipzig, 1507. The best English translations are, Castelli's, with notes by Inigo Jones, and Gwilt's. b. about 80 b.c.; d. about 18 b.c.

VIVARES, François, vé-var, a French engraver, who, at the age of 18, went to London, where he acquired a high reputation as an engraver, particularly of landscape pieces. Woollett had always one of his engravings before him when he was at work. b. in France, 1709; d. in England, 1780.

VIVES, John Louis, es'-rais, a learned Spanish writer, who became professor at Louvain, and was about 1523 invited to England by Henry VIII., who employed him in instructing his daughter, the Princess Mary; but, speaking freely of that monarch's divorce of Catharine of Aragon, he was sent to prison. On recovering his liberty, he settled at Bruges. He wrote a Commentary on St. Augustine's "City of God;" a treatise on the Corruption and Decline of the Arts and Sciences; another on Religion, &c. b. in Spain, 1492; d. at Bruges, 1540.

VIVIAN, Richard Hussey, Lord, viv'-i-an, eldest son of John Vivian, of Truro, Cornwall, commenced his military career as ensign in the 20th Infantry in 1793, when 18 years of age. His regiment formed part of Lord Moira's army on the coast of France; and for the following two years he was present at various battles and affairs of outposts, in Holland and in the West Indies. In 1808 he sailed in command of the 7th dragoons for Corunna, which he reached in November of that year, and had the honour of covering the retreat of Sir John Moore in January, 1809, the 7th dragoons having been left at Lugo for several hours after the march of the main army. Sir Richard reached England in safety, received the brevet of colonel in 1812, and in 1813 embarked with his regiment for the Peninsula. From this time to the battle of Waterloo, in which he commanded the 6th brigade of cavalry, he was continually in active and efficient service. In the advance upon Toulouse, on the 8th of April, 1814, he was severely wounded in the right arm while making, as the duke of Wellington's despatch remarked, "a most gallant attack upon a superior body of the enemy's cavalry, which was driven through the village of Croix d'Orade." In June, 1814, he returned to England, received the rank of major-general, and was appointed to the staff at Brighton. In 1830 he was made lieutenant-general, and in 1837 colonel of the 1st dragoons. Subsequently to the battle of Waterloo, General Vivian, who was created a baronet in 1823, when he also had a grant of arms alluding to his services, took an active part in politics, was a member of Parliament, became master-general of the ordnance in 1835, and was called to the House of Peers in 1841. b. 1775; d. 1842.

VIVIANI, Vincentio, vio-a-d'-ne, an Italian mathematician, who was the disciple of Galileo, and became first mathematician to the grand-duke of Tuscany. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London. His principal works are, a treatise entitled, "Restitution of Aristæus," "Geometrical Recreations," and an edition of Euclid. b. at Florence, 1622; d. 1703.

VLADIMIR, surnamed the Great, grand-duke of Russia, vlad-i-meer, was the illegitimate son of Sviatoslav, who appointed him governor of Novgorod, from which, however, he was driven by Yaropolk, his brother. In 979 he returned to Novgorod, with a large body of Scandinavian adventurers, took prisoner and put to death Yaropolk, and established himself at Kiev as grand-duke of Russia. In 988 he established Christianity, according to the forms of the Greek Church, in his dominions, and, encouraged by the court of Constantinople, spent the remainder of his life in introducing civilization amongst his subjects. b. near Kiev, 1014.

VLADIMIR, Monomachos, grand-duke of Kiev, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded his cousin Sviatopolk in 1112. He proved a wise and beneficent ruler, and introduced many of the arts of civilization among his barbarous subjects. His last instructions to his children were remarkable. He said: "It is neither fast, nor seclusion, nor monastic life, which may save you, but good works. . . . Do not take the life either of the innocent or the guilty; the life and the soul of the Christian are sacred. . . . In your household, look yourselves to everything, without relying on your stewards and servants, and the guests will not find fault either with your house or your dinner. . . . Remember every good thing which you have learnt, and learn what you do not know." The first wife of Vladimir was Gyda, daughter of Harold, king of England. The czars of Russia are crowned with a golden cap called after his second name, which is supposed to have descended from the Greek emperors through Vladimir, who acquired it from Constantine IX., emperor of the East, who was his mother's father. b. 1052; d. 1126.

VOET, Gisbert, vo'-et, or Voetius, a learned divine and professor at Utrecht, who rendered himself remarkable by accusing Descartes of atheism, and afterwards of being a Jesuit. The magistrates of Utrecht were so weak as to condemn the apologetical letters of the philosopher upon the misrepresentations of this bigoted Calvinist. His works are principally upon polemical theology. b. at Heusde, 1593; d. 1680. His son Paul became professor of law at Utrecht, and wrote a treatise in Latin, on lawful and unlawful duels. b. 1619; d. 1677.

VOISENON, Claude Henry Fusée de, voise'-naeng, a celebrated French dramatic writer and wit, who, in his 11th year, addressed a complimentary epistle to Voltaire. He was the author of dramas, operas, and oratorios, literary anecdotes, and historical fragments. Having wounded an eminent man in a duel, he, to expiate the act, took orders; but his after-life was in singular contrast with the vocation he had thus strangely chosen, and for which his character totally unfitted him. He was one of the most servile of the flatterers of Madame du Barry. b. near Milan, 1708; d. 1775.

VOITURE, Vincent, voef'-toor, an elegant French writer, whose wit obtained for him the favour of attending upon the duke of Orleans, by whom he was sent to negotiate affairs of importance at Madrid and other places. His works consist of poems and letters, and an unfinished romance. b. at Amiens, 1598; d. 1648.

VOLKOF, Fedor, vol'-kof, a celebrated Russian actor, who, by frequenting the Italian theatre at St. Petersburg, became passionately fond of the stage, and, having constructed one in a private house, he performed upon it with his brothers. His merits were soon perceived, and he was enabled to erect a proper theatre, and to collect a company. In 1752 he was sent for to St. Petersburg, where the empress Elizabeth took him and his company into her service. Volkof was ennobled, and obtained a large estate. b. 1729; d. at Moscow, 1763.

VOLNEY, Constantin François Chassebœuf, Count de, vol'-ne, a celebrated French writer, who was sent to Paris in 1774 to study the law, which he subsequently abandoned for medicine; but relinquished both in 1783, on succeeding to an independent fortune. He then repaired to the East, and, during eight months, secluded himself in a convent in Egypt, in order to acquire the Arabic language. After travelling over Egypt and Syria, he returned to his native country in 1787, and published an account of his wanderings. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he became a member of the Girondist party; but, being an indifferent orator, had little influence upon the course of events. In 1790 he produced an essay on the "Chronology of the twelve centuries preceding the invasion of Greece by Xerxes;" and in the following year put forth his "Ruines, ou Méditations sur les Révolutions des Empires," which is a popular work in England, although it is principally known through the medium of a wretched translation. Soon afterwards, having purchased an estate in Corsica, he went to reside there, but was compelled to leave the island by Paoli in 1793. He next published "La Loi Naturelle," made the acquaintance of Bonaparte, then an officer of artillery, and was imprisoned by Robespierre, after whose fall he was liberated, and received the appointment of professor of history in the Normal School. In 1795 he crossed the Atlantic, and resided in the United States until the commencement of 1798. He subsequently became commandant of the Legion of Honour, and a count, receiving both dignities from his old friend the ex-officer of artillery, now emperor of France. At the Restoration he was created a peer. Besides the works already enumerated, he produced "A Simple Method of Acquiring the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish Languages," "Travels in the United States," "Supplement to Larcher's Herodotus," "Researches upon the Antiquities of Persia, India, and Babylon," "The European Alphabet applied to the Asiatic Languages," and a treatise upon the philosophical study of language. n. at Craon, Anjou, 1757; p. 1820.

VOLTA, Alessandro, vol'-ta, a celebrated Italian natural philosopher, and the discoverer of the "Voltaic pile." Born of a noble family, he at first evinced poetical tastes, composing, among other pieces, one upon the ascent of Mont Blanc by De Saussure. After travelling in Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England, he repaired to France, where he spent sometime. Upon the entry of Napoleon into Italy, in 1796, Volta received many tokens of the respect in which the victorious general held the brilliant scientific explorer. He was created a knight of the Iron Crown, count, and senator of the new kingdom of Italy. He had long before held the appointment of professor of natural philosophy in the university of Pavia; indeed, it was while he was thus engaged that he made his most important discoveries in electrical science. He discovered the electrophorus in 1775, when making some experiments on the non-conducting power of wood when impregnated with oil. The electrical condenser, which may be termed another form of the electrophorus, was first made known by him in 1782. He contributed an account of this instrument to the 72nd volume of the "Philosophical Transactions." The hydrogen lamp and the electrical pistol were also first made use of by him. It is, however, upon his discovery of the electrical pile that his fame mainly rests. He arrived at a knowledge of this principle by subjecting to a profound analysis the facts already placed before the world by Galvani. An interesting account of these experiments was furnished by himself to the "Philosophical Transactions," in two letters to Sir Joseph Banks. A collected edition of his works was published at Florence in 1816. n. at Como, 1745; p. at the same city, 1827.

VOLTAIRE, François Marie Arouet de, vol'-tair, a celebrated French writer, received his education in the college of Louis le Grand, and, even in his earliest years, evinced proofs of a lively genius. He was intended for the law, which he renounced for poetry. His irresistible turn for satire led to his being taken for the author of some lampoons upon the recently deceased king, Louis XIV., for which he was sent to the Bastille, where he continued during a year, after which he obtained his release from the regent Orleans. About this time he took the name of Voltaire. In 1718 appeared his tragedy of "Œdipus," which met with great success. Having produced some other plays, he was, in 1726, again imprisoned in the Bastille; but, after a confinement of six months, recovered his liberty; on which he went to England, where he published his "Henriade" by subscription. After spending three years in England, he returned to Paris, and divided his time between literature and commercial speculation, in both of which he met with success. In 1730 appeared his tragedy of "Brutus," esteemed the best of his dramatic compositions. This was followed by several others, the principal of which were "Zara," "Merope,"

"Alzire," and "Mahomet." His "Philosophical Letters" were burnt by a decree of Parliament, and the author, apprehensive of the consequences, withdrew from Paris. Subsequently, however, he gained the favour and protection of the court, was appointed historiographer of France, and in 1746 was admitted a member of the French Academy, through the interest of Madame de Pompadour. In 1750 he accepted the invitation of Frederick the Great to reside at Potsdam; but, after a residence of three years in Prussia, some difference arising between the king and the poet, Voltaire quitted Prussia, carrying with him a copy of the poetical works of the king, who caused him to be arrested on the road, till the fugitive manuscript was restored. *Voltaire went to reside at Colmar, whence he removed to Geneva, and afterwards settled at Ferney, a village in the Pays de Gex, which he improved, causing to settle there many ingenious artisans, whose works he sent to Russia, Germany, Spain, Italy, and Holland. At the beginning of the year 1773 he went to reside at Paris, where he was received with many flattering marks of distinction. His remains were interred in the abbey of the Bernardines, near Troyes, but removed, in 1791, by an order of the National Assembly, and laid in the Pantheon, at Paris. Besides his poetical works, he wrote "Essay on General History," "The Age of Louis XIV.," "Life of Charles XII. of Sweden," and "History of the Czar Peter the Great;" the romances of "Candide," "Zadig," and some others. All his works have been published in 70 vols. As a writer, he was lively, brilliant, and imposing; but frequently superficial and dogmatical. "Voltaire," says one of his biographers, "though a deist, professed a great horror of atheism; and in reading all his philosophical and anti-religious works, it is necessary to bear this in mind. It is a great mistake to confound him with the professed atheists of his day, whom he hated, or at least affected to hate, and who viewed his deism with contempt. He has been the subject of almost unqualified panegyric and of unqualified abuse; but he deserves neither. . . . He is not the writer for all ages, and his age is past." n. at Châtenay, near Sceaux, 1694; p. at Paris, 1778.

VONDEL, Joost von den, von'-del, the greatest of the Dutch poets, whose works consist of tragedies, dramatic poems, and epics. n. 1537; p. at Amsterdam, 1679.

VON DER HARDT, Herman, hart, an eminent German biblical commentator, who became librarian to the duke of Brunswick, and, in 1690, professor of oriental languages at Helmstadt. He wrote commentaries upon the Bible, the "History of the Council of Constance," &c. n. at Osnabruck, 1660; p. 1746.

VORISIUS, Flavius, vo'-pis'-kus, a Latin historian, who wrote the lives of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmius, Carus, &c., which are included in the "Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores." n. at Syraeuse, and lived in the 4th century.

VORSTIUS, or VORST, Conrad, forst, an eminent German theological writer, who, in 1610, succeeded Arminius in the chair of divinity at Leyden. James I., king of England, caused his book upon the attributes of God to be publicly burnt, and denounced its author as a heretic, to the States of Holland. After losing his professorship, and being exiled from Holland, he retired to Holstein. He produced several other controversial books. n. at Cologne, 1569; n. at Tönningen, 1622.

VORTIGERN, vor-ti-gern, a British chief, who, upon the departure of the Romans in 420, was chosen king of South Britain. To repel the Scots and Picts, he invited to his assistance the Saxons, who landed in 425, under the command of Hengist and Horsa, who drove out the invaders, but frequently returned for the purpose of plunder, and ultimately settled in England. Vortigern subsequently married Rowena, daughter of Hengist, and, on his marriage, gave the father the kingdom of Kent. It is not known when and where Vortigern died.

Voss, Gerard John, foss, or Vossius, Gerardus Johannes, the Latinized form adopted by himself. A man of profound learning, he became professor of eloquence and chronology at Leyden in 1617. His "History of Pelagianism" rendered him obnoxious to the Calvinists; but it procured him in England the favour of Archbishop Laud, and a prebend in the cathedral of Canterbury. While in England, he was admitted to the degree of doctor of laws at Oxford. In 1633 he accepted the professorship of history at Amsterdam. His works consist principally of classical antiquities. n. near Heidelberg, 1577; n. 1640.

Vossius, Dionysius, vos-si-us, son of the preceding, was profoundly learned in the Oriental languages, and published a Latin translation of Maimonides on Idolatry, with notes, and other works. n. at Dort, 1612; n. at Amsterdam, 1633.

Vossius, Isaac, a learned German writer, and another son of Gerard John Vossius, visited Sweden on the invitation of Queen Christina, and in 1670 settled in England, obtaining from Charles II. a canonry of Windsor, and the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Oxford. He published a book to prove that the Septuagint version was produced by inspiration; but, though he was remarkable for believing the strangest inconsistencies, he expressed some doubts respecting the sacred text, which led Charles II. to say of him, "This learned divine is a strange man; he believes everything but the Bible." His works are numerous. n. at Leyden, 1619; n. at Windsor Castle, 1688.

Vossius, Gerard, a Romish divine, and relation of the preceding, published the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Ephrem Syrus, and some pieces of John Chrysostom and Theodoret, with Latin versions and notes. n. 1609; n. about 1680.

Vossius, or Voss, Johann Heinrich, a learned German philologist, who became rector of the gymnasium at Eutin, but subsequently settled at Heidelberg, whither his great reputation had caused him to be invited by the elector of Baden. He translated Homer, Virgil, Hesiod, and Theocritus, and takes rank as among the very first scholars of Germany. He also produced commentaries on several Greek writers, and may be considered one of the founders of modern philology. n. in Mecklenburg, 1751; n. at Heidelberg, 1826.

VOUET, Simon, voe-ai, an eminent French painter, who was, during some time, painter of the Academy of St. Luke, at Rome; but was recalled to France by Louis XIII., who employed him in ornamenting his palace, and gave him a pension. He was the founder of the French school. n. at Paris, 1590; n. 1649.

Vagenseil

VROOM, Henry Cornelius, vroom, a Dutch painter, who excelled in depicting sea-fights, and was engaged to make designs for the tapestry in the House of Lords, representing the destruction of the Spanish armada. n. 1566; n. 1619.

VAGENSEIL, Gustav Friedrich, va'-gen, a modern German art-critic, who, at a comparatively early age, became director of the Royal Gallery of Paintings at Berlin. He had previously devoted himself with zeal to the study of art, and had produced at Munich a small work on the Royal Bavarian collection. His fame as a writer upon art commenced in England with the year 1838, when a translation of one of his works was produced under the title of "Treasures of Art in Great Britain." In 1857 he published a small work upon the exhibition at Manchester, entitled "A Walk through the Art Treasures Exhibition: what to Observe." In that exhibition, the plan of hanging the pictures first suggested by him, and adopted at the Berlin Gallery, was carried out with the happiest effect. While in England he was requested to give his opinion as to the best mode of arranging the paintings in the National Gallery. He also produced a short life of Rubens, and other works. n. at Hamburg, 1794.

WACE, GUACE, or HUSTACE, Master Robert, vice, an old Anglo-Norman poet, who appears to have been educated for the clerical profession, and to have held the appointment of reading clerk in the private chapel of Henry I., who generally held his court at Caen. He composed, among other poems, the "Roman du Rou," a rhymed chronicle of the dukes of Normandy, from Rollo to the eighth year of Henry I. This work, which was completed in 1160, was presented to Henry II., who, in reward, gave the poet a canonry in the cathedral of Bayeux. He also wrote "Le Brut d'Angleterre," which is the history of one Brutus, great-grandson of Æneas, who was supposed to have ruled in Britain. The "Roman du Rou," contains a very graphic description of the battle of Hastings, and the chief historical events of the time. n. in England, about 1184.

WADHAM, Nicholas, wad'-ham, the founder of Wadham College, Oxford, was born in Somersetshire, and educated at Christchurch College. The seminary which bears his name was completed in 1613. n. 1536; n. 1610.

WADING, Luke, wai'-ding, a learned Irish divine, who went at an early age to Spain, where he became professor of theology in the university of Salamanca. He subsequently repaired to Rome, where he held several high ecclesiastical appointments. He edited the works of Denis Scotus and some of the writings of St. Francis, and wrote a history of the Spanish embassy of Philip III. to Rome, &c. n. at Waterford, 1549; n. at Rome, 1657.

WAGENSEIL, John Christopher, va'-gen-sile, a learned German writer, who became professor of law and history at Altorf, but exchanged that professorship for the chair of Oriental Languages. He produced, among other learned works, a translation of the Mishna and Ghe-mara, and a collection of Hebrew writers against Christianity, whom he refuted. n. at Nuremberg, 1633; n. 1705.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Waghorn

WAGHORN, Thomas, wăf-lorn, lieutenant in the royal navy, and the projector of the overland route to India. After seeing much service in the Indian seas, he, in 1827, while residing at Calcutta, proposed to the government there a plan for steam communication between England and the East Indies. Repairing to England, he made known his project to the authorities of the Post-Office, the Board of Control, and the Court of Directors; but found it opposed in almost every quarter. Obtaining the patronage of Lord Ellenborough, he was permitted to carry government despatches for the governor of Bombay through Egypt, and, although he encountered an unusual number of difficulties, he completely succeeded in his mission. With the assistance of the Bombay Steam Committee, he commenced the establishing of the overland route, built hotels and halting-places in the desert between Cairo and Suez, and placed steamers upon the Red Sea. Between the years 1831-34, he superintended the entire working of the overland route himself. After the government had taken up the idea, he continued to explore other routes than that through France, and, in 1847, found that journeying by Trieste effected a saving of thirteen days. Unfortunately, he lost all his property in the prosecution of the Trieste route, and, as a still greater misfortune, his health gave way under the anxiety of mind consequent upon his great labours. A small pension was granted to his widow. b. at Chatham, Kent, 1800; d. in London, 1850.

WAGSTAFFE, Thomas, wăf-staf, a learned English divine, who became chancellor of Lichfield cathedral; but was deprived at the Revolution, for refusing the oaths. He practised physic for some time, and in 1693 was consecrated a nonjuring bishop. He published several sermons, and a vindication of the claim of King Charles I. to the authorship of the "Eikon Basilike." b. in Warwickshire, 1645; d. 1702.

WAKE, Sir Isaac, an English writer, who became public orator of the University of Oxford, and was sent as ambassador to Venice and Savoy; on which occasion he was knighted. He wrote "Lex Platoniensis;" "Discourse on the Thirteen Cantons of the Helvetic League;" "On the State of Italy;" and "On the Proceedings of the King of Sweden." b. about 1575; d. 1632.

WAKE, William, a learned English prelate, who became chaplain to William III. and Queen Mary, and preacher to the society of Gray's Inn. In 1705 he was appointed bishop of Lincoln, and in 1716 translated to Canterbury. He had a controversy with Dr. Atterbury on the rights of Convocation, and entered into a correspondence with some of the French bishops relative to a union between the two churches. He published a translation of the Epistles of the Apostolical Fathers; "Exposition of the Church Catechism;" and tracts against Popery. b. at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1657; d. 1737.

WAKEFIELD, Robert, wăk-feeld, a learned English divine, who was in 1519 nominated Hebrew professor at Louvain, but shortly afterwards returned to England, became king's chaplain, and was appointed Hebrew professor at Oxford. He wrote a "Paraphrase on the Ecclesiasties," "Syntagma de Hebræorum," and other works. b. 1537.

Rev. Gilbert, an eminent and learned English writer, who, in 1776, became fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. In the same year he published a collection of Latin poems, with notes on Homer. After entering into holy orders, and obtaining a curacy in Liverpool, he, about 1779, resolved to quit the church. For a short time he held the office of classical tutor in the dissenting academy at Warrington. While there, he published a number of works, the principal of which were, a translation of the first Epistle to the Thessalonians; another of the Gospel of St. Matthew; and an "Enquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the first three Centuries, concerning the Person of Jesus Christ." In 1780 he removed to the dissenting college at Hackney, his connexion with which ended in about a year. Soon after this, he published a pamphlet against public worship, which startled many of his most ardent admirers, and was answered chiefly by dissenters. He continued to reside at Hackney, engaged in classical studies, till the progress of the French revolution and the war led him into the field of politics. He wrote some pamphlets against the government, of which no notice was taken; but his letter to the bishop of Landaff was considered as so inflammatory, and of so dangerous a tendency, that the attorney-general instituted a prosecution against him, and he was sentenced to be imprisoned for two years in Dorchester gaol, from whence he was liberated in 1801. In religion he was a Socinian, and in political views a republican. As a classical and critical scholar, his attainments were extraordinary; and his critical productions are highly valued, while his other works are forgotten. His most important performances were, a translation of the New Testament; "Tragediæ una Græcorum Delectus;" an edition of Lucretius; "The Evidences of Christianity;" and an edition of Horace. b. at Nottingham, 1756; d. 1801.

WALCH, Christian Wilhelm Franz, wălk, an eminent German divine, who became professor of philosophy in the University of Jena in 1760, and in 1767 of divinity at Göttingen. He produced a number of learned works upon jurisprudence, biblical antiquities, philology, and was likewise the author of a small biography of Catherine von Bora, wife of Luther. b. at Jena, 1726; d. 1784.—There were many others of this name who were eminent as scholars in Germany.

WALDECK, Princes of, wăl-dek, one of the most ancient dynasties of Northern Germany, descended probably from Wittekind. The most celebrated members of the house were:—George Frederick, who served the emperor Leopold I., and defeated the French and the Turks in several battles. He also became commander-in-chief of the armies of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and died 1692.—His brother, Count Josias, commanded the military forces of the Venetian republic; he died in 1711.—Prince Christian Augustus was distinguished in the wars against the French during the revolutionary period, and one of the commanders of the imperial armies. He suggested the celebrated attack made upon the French at Weissenburg, by the combined Austrian and Prussian armies in 1793; and particularly distinguished himself in the passage of the Rhine, near Selz. The fortress of Kiel, opposite Strasburg, was taken by him. In 1797 he, at the request of the prince-regent, proceeded to Portugal for the purpose of re-organizing the army there, but died in the following year.

WALDEGRAVE, James, Earl, wal'-de-grav, an English statesman, and a favourite of George II. In 1737 he was charged with the formation of a ministry, and, says Walpole, "the public was not more astonished at that designation than himself;" the idea was, however, abandoned almost immediately. He left some interesting "Memoirs" from 1751 to 1758. His wife, a natural daughter of Sir Edward Walpole, son of the statesman Sir Robert, after his death married the duke of Gloucester, brother of George III. She was the mother of the late duke of Gloucester and Princess Sophia Matilda. The earl died 1763. B. 1715.

WALDEMAR I., wal'-de-maf, king of Denmark, succeeded Eric IV., in 1139, when only in his 8th year, under the guardianship of Eric, son-in-law of Eric III., who, however, usurped the crown, and reigned as Eric V., until 1147. After many troubles Waldemar obtained the undisturbed possession of his crown in 1157. He subsequently distinguished himself as a warrior and legislator, caused a collection of Danish laws to be made, and earned, by the wisdom of his rule, the title of "Great," which is usually appended to his name in the histories of Denmark. B. 1131; D. 1181 or 1182.

WALDEMAR II., styled "the Victorious," succeeded his brother Canute VI. in 1202. While heir-apparent, he had distinguished himself by conquering Holstein. He conceived the idea of founding a Baltic empire, which should embrace Denmark, Holstein, Courland, Livonia, Esthland, the southernmost parts of Sweden and Norway, and the islands in the Baltic. During some years his arms were successful both on land and sea, and the realization of his project appeared about to be accomplished. In 1220 he was made prisoner by treachery, and was not released until he had ceded Holstein and Mecklenburg. His army was shortly afterwards totally defeated in Holstein, and his navy destroyed in 1231. Thereupon he devoted himself to the propagation of the arts of peace throughout the remnant of his former possessions. D. 1241.

WALDEMAR III., became king of Denmark in 1236. He disposed of Esthland, Courland, and Livonia, to the grand master of the Teutonic Orders of Prussia, for 18,000 silver marks, and with this money equipped an army and navy, which latter was, however, subsequently destroyed by the Hanseatic troops. D. 1315; D. 1375.

WALDO, Peter, wal'-do, the founder of the sect of Waldenses, was originally a merchant of Lyons. He gave his property to the poor, preached the gospel to them, and obtained many followers. Driven from Lyons, they went into Dauphny, Provence, and other countries. Though their manners were inoffensive, yet, as they had seceded from the church of Rome, a crusade was formed against them, by which many thousands were destroyed. The sect, however, still continued, and spread over the valleys of Piedmont. D. about 1180.

WALZES, William, wal'-zes, an eminent English mathematician, who, in 1768, was selected by the government to proceed to Hudson's Bay for the purpose of observing the transit of the planet Venus over the sun's disc. He next accompanied Captain Cook in his second voyage round the world, as astronomer, and on his return, published an "Account of Astronomical Observations made in the Southern Hemisphere," and was appointed mathematical master of Christ's Hospital. He was also the author of "Remarks on Mr. Forster's Account of Cook's Voyage;" "An Inquiry into the Population of England and Wales;" and an improved edition of Robertson's "Elements of Navigation." B. about 1731; D. 1793.

WALEWSKI, Florian Alexandre Joseph Colonna, Count, va-loos'-ke, a modern French statesman, who at first served in the army, but afterwards abandoned the military profession for a mixed political and literary career. By Thiers he was sent upon a mission to Egypt, and under Guizot's administration he held a post in the French legation at Buenos Ayres. After the election of Louis Napoleon to the presidency, of the French republic, he attached himself to the Napoleonic party, and was appointed envoy extraordinary at Florence, passing thence to Naples. In 1851 he was nominated ambassador at the court of St. James's, and in the following year became minister for foreign affairs. At the congress of Paris he represented the French nation, and was one of those who appended their signatures to the treaty that resulted from that conference. In 1852 he was created grand commander of the Legion of Honour, and in 1855 was nominated a member of the senate. He was alleged to be the son of Napoleon I., by a young and beautiful Polish lady, wife of Count Walewski, an aged Sarmatian, noble, from whom she was carried off by the emperor, and gave birth to her son at the castle of Walewiec in 1810. D. 1868.

WALKER, Clement, waw'-ker, an English writer, who previously to the civil war was usher of the exchequer, and member of Parliament for Wells. He wrote, the "History of Independency," for which he was sent to the Tower by Cromwell; "The High Court of Justice; or Cromwell's Slaughter-house;" and other works. B. at Cliffe, Dorsetshire, about 1599; D. in the Tower of London, 1651.

WALKER, Robert, an English artist, who was appointed painter to Oliver Cromwell. A portrait of the Protector by him was purchased by an agent of the grand-duke of Tuscany for £500. He also painted the portraits of Monk, Blake, and other naval and military commanders of the time. D. about 1670.

WALKER, Sir Edward, an English historical writer, who in 1630 was made secretary at war, and was present at the battle of Edgehill with the royal army. In 1643 he was appointed Garter king-at-arms, and knighted; and, after the Restoration, became one of the clerks of the Privy Council. He wrote, "Historical Discourses;" "Ceremonies employed in the Celebration of St. George's Day at Windsor;" "Account of the Coronation of Charles II.;" "Acts of the Knights of the Garter in the Civil Wars;" &c. B. in Somersetshire, about 1610; D. 1677.

WALKER, William, a learned English divine and grammarian, was successively master of the schools of Lowth and Grantham, in Lincolnshire, and had the honour of instructing Sir Isaac Newton. He wrote several works on Grammar, Rhetoric, and Logic, and a treatise on English Particles. B. 1623; D. 1684.

WALKER, Rev. George, a celebrated Irish divine, who distinguished himself by his gallant defence of Londonderry, in 1689, against the forces of James II., till it was effectually relieved. He afterwards repaired to London, published an account of the siege, and was nominated by William III. to the bishopric of Derry; but, continuing to accompany the army, he was slain at the battle of the Boyne, in 1690.

WALKER, Obadiah, an English divine, who became master of University College, Oxford, and, embracing the Roman Catholic faith, he, during the reign of James II., attempted, with that monarch's sanction, to restore the old religion in the university; but at the revolution he was deprived of his offices and imprisoned. After regaining his freedom, he retired into private life. A man of considerable learning, he produced "Greek and Roman History illustrated by Coins and Medals;" "Instructions in the Art of Oratory;" "A Brief Account of Ancient Church Government," &c. b. in Yorkshire, about 1616; d. in London, 1692.

WALKER, Rev. John, an English divine and writer, who, among other works, produced "An Account of the suffering of the Clergy in the Great Rebellion." d. at Exeter, 1730.

WALKER, Samuel, an English divine, who produced several excellent works upon theology. d. at Exeter, 1714; d. 1761.

WALKER, John, an English lexicographer, who was educated for a commercial career, but became an actor, a schoolmaster, and finally a teacher of elocution, in which last employment he attained a high success, and was invited to give private lectures in the university of Oxford. Having previously put forth a prospectus, he in 1772 published his "Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language;" which work obtaining a great success, he was encouraged to produce "A Rhyming Dictionary," "Elements of Elocution," "Critical Pronouncing Dictionary" (his most important work); "Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names;" "Outlines of English Grammar," and "The Academic Speaker." He had been educated as a Presbyterian; but, towards the close of his life, embraced the Roman Catholic faith. b. at Colney-latch, Middlesex, 1732; d. in London, 1807.

WALKER, Adam, a lecturer on astronomy and a miscellaneous writer, was a native of Westmoreland, where his father carried on the trade of a woollen manufacturer, in which business Adam was placed at an early age, and his turn for mechanics very soon developed itself in the construction of models of corn-mills, paper-mills, &c. After acquiring a considerable proficiency in scientific knowledge, he became a public lecturer on experimental philosophy, and published an "Analysis of his Lectures," a "System of Familiar Philosophy in Lectures," a "Treatise on Geography," "Remarks on a Tour through Germany, France, and Italy," "A Tour to the Lakes," &c. His mechanical skill was exhibited in his Eidouranium, or transparent orrery, and the revolving lights on the rocks of Scilly. b. 1731; d. 1821.

WALL, John, an eminent physician, was educated at Worcester Grammar-school, and at Merton College, Oxford; and settling at Worcester as a medical practitioner, first made known the virtues of the Malvern waters, and contributed to establish the porcelain manufactory at Worcester. b. 1708; d. 1778.

WALLACE, Sir William, scal-lace, a popular Scotch hero. Having slain the son and several of the retainers of the English sheriff of Dundee, for an insult offered to him, Wallace fled to the woods; and was outlawed. Gathering together a number of followers, he drove the English out of Aberdeen, Forfar, Brechin, and elsewhere, and in 1297 defeated the English army at the battle of Stirling Bridge; thus liberating his country for a time. Revered as the saviour of the nation, he was chosen one of the commanders-in-chief of the Scottish army, and afterwards guardian of the kingdom, during the captivity of Baliol. He penetrated into England, and ravaged Durham with fire and sword. Edward I., then in Flanders, immediately hastened home and marched against Wallace, who was defeated. His subsequent history is obscurely narrated; but he appears to have carried on a guerilla warfare against the English during several years, until at length he was basely betrayed, and executed in London in 1305. b. near Paisley, probably about 1270.

WALLENSTEIN, Albert Wenceslaus Eusebius, val-len-stine, duke of Mecklenburg, count of Waldstein, a celebrated Imperialist general, was the son of Wilhelm von Waldstein, a Bohemian baron. Although born a Protestant, his uncle and guardian sent him to be educated under the Jesuits at Olmütz, where he was converted to the Roman Catholic faith. Leaving Olmütz, he proceeded to Italy, where he acquired a knowledge of astronomy, the Roman and German law, and was well grounded in the ancient and modern languages. His first military service was in Hungary, where he signalized himself at the capture of Gran from the Turks by the Imperialists. After rendering assistance to the emperor Ferdinand II., both by lending him money and as a successful commander of his army, he received, upon the deposition of Frederick of Bohemia, immense estates in the conquered country. His great wealth, his fame as a commander, and his high rate of pay, attracted to his standard military adventurers from almost every country in Europe. In concert with Tilly he gained a number of successes, defeated Mansfeld, and brought to a glorious termination the campaign of 1626. In the following year he took the field at the head of 50,000 men, with whom he marched from Silesia to Denmark, forcing Christian to cross the Belt, and thus save the remainder of his army. At the conclusion of the Danish war he received the duchies of Mecklenburg as a reward for his services. Wallenstein was further created admiral of the Baltic and the German Sea, and taking up his residence at Wismar, conceived the idea of forming a navy for the purpose of resisting the designs of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, which his superior penetration had enabled him thus early to discern. He also wrote to his imperial master, "I beg of you, sire, to observe well this Swede, for he is a dangerous fellow." But the honours which had been heaped upon the victorious general raised up against him a number of powerful enemies near the emperor's person. At the head of this conspiracy to effect the downfall of Wallenstein were Tilly and Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, who urged the emperor to dismiss the "dictator." Yielding at length to these intrigues, Ferdinand dismissed Wallenstein, who retired to his estates in Bohemia. Gustavus Adolphus invaded Germany almost immediately afterwards; the imperial armies were worsted at Leipsic; Bavaria was conquered by the Swedes, and Tilly was killed. The emperor, to avert the ruin of his country, turned to Wallenstein, who however would not consent to resume his command until he had exacted from Ferdinand the most exorbitant conditions. In a short time he forced Gustavus Adolphus to evacuate Bavaria, pursued him into Saxony, but lost the battle of Lützen, which disaster was, nevertheless, more than compensated by the death of the great Swedish king, who fell in the fight. In 1633 he was commanded by the emperor to winter in Lower Saxony; but Wallenstein refused to obey. Hereupon, his enemies at the imperial court urged Ferdinand to get rid of his haughty lieutenant. Wallenstein learning that the emperor was preparing to deprive him of his command, announced his intention of resigning; but his officers entreated him to remain at their head, signing the celebrated declaration of Pilsen, by which they bound themselves to remain faithful to his fortunes. This act was represented to the emperor as a conspiracy against his person and power. He therefore signed an edict declaring Wallenstein a rebel, and gave secret orders to Piccolomini and Gallas to take him dead or alive. Meanwhile, Wallenstein sent two officers to the emperor with his offer of resignation; but his messengers were prevented from obtaining an interview. At the approach of Piccolomini and Gallas, Wallenstein, after requesting an asylum with the Swedes, which was refused, took refuge with a small band of his faithful adherents in the castle of Eger, the commandant of which, Gordon, treacherously put him to death with his most devoted friends. In 1834 Dr. Forster published a work, written from materials supplied by the private military archives of Vienna, in which he proved that Wallenstein was completely innocent of the charge of conspiring against his sovereign. B. in Bohemia, 1583; killed, 1634. The career and tragic fate of Wallenstein furnished the subject of one of Schiller's best plays, which has been translated into English by S. T. Coleridge.

WALLER, Edmund, wol'-ler, an eminent English poet, who received his education at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge, but is stated to have become a member of Parliament at the age of 18. In 1643 he was sent to the Tower on a charge of conspiring to deliver the city to the king. Two persons were executed for the plot, and Waller was condemned to be hanged, but saved himself by an abject submission and a liberal distribution of money. After a year's imprisonment, he went to France; but about 1653, returned by favour of Cromwell, on whom and praised Charles II. He was again elected to Parliament, where, according to Bishop Burnet, he became, by his eloquence and wit, secution of that great man. His poems are easy, smooth, and generally elegant. B. at Colleshill, Hertfordshire, 1605; D. at Beaconsfield, 1637.

WALLER, Sir William, an English parliamentary general, who, after completing his education at Oxford, went abroad, and served in the armies of the Protestant league against the emperor. Returning to England, he entered Parliament, and was knighted by Charles I.; but, upon the outbreak of the Civil War, embraced the popular cause, and was appointed to command by the Parliament. He signalled himself at the capture of Portsmouth, in 1642, but was three times defeated by the royalists in the following year. He was victorious at Cheriton Down, near Winchester, in 1644. A few months later, he was beaten by the royalists in Oxfordshire; and these repeated reverses led to his being deprived of his command in 1645. He remained as one of the leaders of the Presbyterian party in Parliament during two years; at the end of which period he was expelled the House of Commons, with ten other members, by Colonel Pride. In 1659 he was arrested upon the charge of complicity in the Cheshire insurrection, and remained in prison for some months. In 1680 he was appointed one of the Council of State, and in the Convention Parliament he represented Middlesex, which would appear to have been his last appearance as a public man. He was the author of two works, entitled, respectively, "Divine Meditations upon Several Occasions," and a "Vindication" of his conduct, which last is of great value as a contribution to the history of the period. He was descended from the same family as the poet Waller. B. in Kent, 1597; D. at Asterley Park, 1688.

WALLIN, John Oloff, wol'-lin, an Swedish poet and theologian, who became a member of the Swedish Academy, and theological tutor to Prince Oskar, afterwards king of Sweden, and finally archbishop of Upsal. As a writer of hymns he occupies the same place with his countrymen as does Dr. Watts in England. His principal works were psalms, religious discourses, and sermons. B. in Dalecarlia, 1779; D. 1839.

WALLIS, John, wol'-lis, a learned English divine and mathematician, who, after becoming fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1640 entered into orders. Repairing to London, he embraced the cause of the Parliamentarians, by whom he was employed in deciphering intercepted letters of the royalist party. He afterwards became Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and keeper of the archives of that university. He was also one of the founders of the Royal Society. At the Restoration he was confirmed in his places, became chaplain to the king, and was one of the divines employed in revising the Liturgy. He published some works against Hobbes, an English grammar under the title of "Grammatica Lingue Anglicane," and a number of mathematical and theological works of the high it was of the Roman Catholic faith, and became a monk of the Benedictine order located in England. In 1756 he was nominated a bishop.

member of the mathematical body employed in re-arranging the calendar. He enriched the "Philosophical Transactions" with some learned contributions, and produced commentaries upon the Apocalypse, the vision of Ezekiel, &c. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. B. 1721; D. at Bath, 1797.

WALPOLE, Sir Robert, earl of Orford, wol'-pole, a celebrated English statesman, who, in 1700, commenced his parliamentary career as member for Castle Rising. Rapidly acquiring fame as a politician he became, in 1703, secretary at war and leader of the Whig party in the House of Commons; but when the Tories, under Harley and St. John, obtained power, Walpole was, with other members of the late Whig administration, voted by the Commons to be guilty of corruption, and ordered to be expelled the House. The Whig party, however, strenuously supported him, and he was re-elected to Parliament, though the House declared the election void. At the accession of George I. the Whigs again became the leading party, and Walpole was made paymaster-general of the forces. Distinguishing himself by his zeal for the welfare of the Hanoverian dynasty, as well as by his able conduct as a politician, he acquired so much consideration, that, during the troubles caused by the rebellion of the Pretender, he was nominated first lord of the Treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer. A change of administration taking place in 1717, he remained in opposition during three years; but accepted office under Lord Sunderland in 1723; and was, in the following year, appointed first lord of the treasury, in the room of his late chief, who had been compelled to retire in consequence of the obloquy which his participation in the unfortunate South-Sea scheme had brought upon him. After holding office with great firmness during twenty years, Walpole was compelled to resign, and was created earl of Orford, with a pension of £4000 a year. b. at Houghton, 1676; d. 1745.

WALPOLE, Horace, earl of Orford, an eminent English author, and youngest son of the preceding, was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge, where he wrote some verses on Henry VI., the founder. In 1738 he was appointed inspector of exports and imports, which place he exchanged for that of usher of the Exchequer. The year following he travelled with the poet Gray; but a separation took place in Italy, owing to some misunderstanding between the two friends. In 1741 Mr. Walpole was elected to Parliament; but, although he retained his seat during twenty-eight years, he distinguished himself in debate upon only two occasions,—once in defence of his father's late administration, and again in favour of the unfortunate Admiral Byng. He retired from Parliament in 1768, and led a life of literary ease at his villa of Strawberry Hill, at Twickenham, where he formed a collection of books, manuscripts, pictures, and other works of art or of curiosity, and set up a printing-press, from which proceeded several elegant works, by himself and others. On the death of his nephew, in 1791, he succeeded to the title of earl of Orford; but as it had always been his habit to despise titles, he appeared to be anxious to dispense with his own on as many occasions as possible. His letters were frequently signed "The uncle of the late earl of Orford." This title became extinct at his own death. He wrote "A Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors;" "Historic Doubts concerning Richard III.;" "Anecdotes of Painting, enlarged from Vertue;" "The Castle of Otranto," a romance; of him as "the best letter-writer in the English language." b. 1717; d. in London, 1797.

WALPOLE, Horatio, Lord, brother of Sir Robert, held various offices under the government, was an able diplomatist, and was created a peer in 1756. He wrote an answer to Bolingbroke's "Letters on History," and some political pamphlets. b. 1678; d. 1757.

WALSH, William, wolsh, an English poet, who became gentleman of the horse to Queen Anne. He was the early friend of Pope, and is spoken of in complimentary terms in the "Essay on Criticism." His poems are, however, not above mediocrity. b. at Abberley, Worcestershire, about 1660; d. 1703.

WALSH, Edward, an eminent physician, was a native of Ireland, and graduated as M.D. at Edinburgh. He commenced his professional career as physician in a West India packet, and afterwards served as an army surgeon in Ireland during the rebellion, and in the expeditions to Holland and Copenhagen. He proceeded to Canada with the 49th regiment, was afterwards attached to the 6th dragoons, and sent to Spain; and, having accompanied the Walcheren expedition, was promoted to the staff, went to the continent as physician to the forces, and closed his career in the army at the battle of Waterloo. Dr. Walsh published "A Narrative of the Expedition to Holland," and "Bagatelles, or Poetical Sketches." b. 1832.

WALSINGHAM, Sir Francis, wol-sing-ham, a celebrated English statesman, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, after which he went abroad. Returning to his native country just after the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he entered upon public employment, and was twice sent as ambassador to the French court. In 1573 he was appointed secretary of state, and knighted. He subsequently acted as ambassador to the Netherlands, to France, and to Scotland; was one of the commissioners upon the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and had a principal share in detecting Babington's plot. He was a man of deep penetration and of profound policy. "To him," says Lloyd, "men's faces spake as much as their tongues, and their countenances were indexes to their hearts." His great abilities as a statesman were appreciated by his royal mistress. For an able account of his policy, the "History of the United Netherlands," by J. L. Motley, should be consulted. Some of his negotiations and despatches were published under the title of "The Complete Ambassador." b. at Chislehurst, Kent, 1536; d. 1590.

WALSINGHAM, Thomas, a Benedictine monk of St. Albans, who printed, in Latin, "A Short History from Edward I. to Henry V." Lived in the 15th century.

WALTER, John, wol-ter, an English printer, whose father, of the same name, started the "Times" newspaper, on the 1st of January, 1788. Of that print he himself became manager and principal proprietor in 1803; and under his direction the newspaper rapidly rose to a very high position, both in a social and political sense. He was the earliest newspaper proprietor to take advantage of the application of steam power to the working of a printing-machine, the "Times" being first printed in that manner on the 29th of November, 1814. In 1833 Mr. Walter was returned to Parliament for the county of Berks, where he had previously purchased an estate; he also represented the borough of Nottingham for a short time. b. 1784; d. in London, 1847.

WALTER, John, son of the preceding, and his successor as the principal proprietor of the "Times" newspaper, after taking his degree at the university of Oxford, entered upon the study of the law, and was in 1847, called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn. He was chosen member for Nottingham in the same year. a. in London, 1818.

WALTERS, John, wol'-ters, a Welsh divine, of the established church, who compiled a valuable English and Welsh Lexicon. He was also the author of a "Dissertation on the Welsh Language," and some sermons. b. 1797.

WALTON, Brian, wol'-ton, a learned English prelate, who, about 1639, became prebendary of St. Paul's and chaplain to the king. In the civil war he espoused the royal cause, for which he was deprived of his ecclesiastical offices; upon which he went to Oxford. He there commenced collecting materials for his Polyglot Bible, in which he was assisted by the eminent Dr. Edmund Castell and others. This learned work was published in 1655-57. After the Restoration he was appointed chaplain to Charles II., and in 1661 was preferred to the see of Chester. Besides the great Polyglot Bible, he was the author of a defence of the work against Dr. John Owen. a. in Cleveland, Yorkshire, 1600; b. in London, 1681.

WALTON, Isaac, the "Father of angling," and an eminent biographical writer, kept a hosiery shop in Fleet Street, and afterwards in Chancery Lane, in Clerkenwell, and elsewhere. His well-known work, "The Complete Angler; or, the Contemplative Man's Recreation," first appeared in 1653, and was afterwards enlarged by his friend, Charles Cotton. He was also the author of the Lives of the English ecclesiastics Donne, Wotton, Hooker, Herbert, and Sanderson; a collection of the letters of Sir Henry Wotton, and some poetical pieces. a. at Stamford, 1593; b. at Winchester, 1633.

WANLEY, Nathaniel, won'-le, an English divine, who, in 1678, published a curious book, called "The Wonders of the Little World, or, the History of Man." b. 1633; b. 1680.

WANLEY, Humphrey, an English writer, and son of the preceding, became secretary to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and librarian to the earl of Oxford, the founder of the Harleian library, and formed a catalogue of Saxon manuscripts for Dr. Hickes's Thesaurus of the Northern Languages. a. at Coventry, 1672; b. 1726.

WANSLIEBEN, John Michael, cons-lai'-ben, a learned German writer, who was at first employed by Ludolf in superintending in London the printing of his Ethiopic Lexicon. He also assisted Dr. Castell in preparing his "Lexicon Heptaglotton." The duke of Saxe-Gotha sent him to Abyssinia, and he was afterwards employed by Colbert to collect manuscripts and medals for the library of the king of France in Egypt. His principal work was, "An Account of the Condition of the Ethiopian Christians," written in Latin. a. at Erfurt, 1635; b. near Fontainebleau, 1679.

WARBECK, Perkin, war'-bek, an individual whose real history has been the subject of much speculation, made his appearance in England in the reign of Henry VII., and assumed the character and title of Richard, duke of York, the younger son of Edward IV., supposed to have been murdered in the Tower, together with his brother, by order of Richard III. Having been acknowledged by Margaret, duchess of Burgundy, as her nephew, he proceeded to claim the crown of England, and, landing in Cornwall, was joined by some thousands of insurgents. He laid siege to Exeter; but, on the approach of the royal army, fled to Beaulieu Abbey, in Hampshire, which sanctuary he was induced to quit under the promise of a pardon, and was sent to the Tower of London. He was there treated as an impostor, and eventually, in 1499, was hanged, drawn, and quartered. Henry VII. published an alleged confession of the captive, purporting that he was the son of one Warbeck or Osbeck, a converted Jew of Tournay; but many have asserted that he was an illegitimate son of Edward IV.

WARBURTON, William, wor'-ber-ton, a learned English prelate, who was brought up to the profession of an attorney, which he relinquished, and after going through a course of study took orders without having received a university education. He afterwards received the degree of D.D. by mandamus from Cambridge. After acquiring a high literary reputation by his writings, he was in 1759 consecrated bishop of Gloucester. His greatest work was the "Divine Legation of Moses," in which he defended revelation upon the grounds of religious deism by admitting, that though a future state made no part of the Jewish legislator's system, yet that the truth of the Mosaic scheme is capable of a moral demonstration. This work was, however, attacked with great violence, to which Warburton replied with haughtiness and asperity. Prior in point of publication, but next in ability, was the "Alliance betwixt Church and State," in which his object was to prove the necessity of religious establishments. Besides these works, Dr. Warburton printed a discourse entitled, "Julian, or a Discourse concerning the Earthquake and Fiery Eruptions which defeated that Emperor's attempt to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem," "Sermons," "A view of Lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy," a "Tract on the Lord's Supper," a "Treatise against the Methodists on the Doctrine of Grace," and several miscellaneous pieces. His friend Bishop Hurd published a complete edition of his works in 1788. Pope left him the copyright of his works, which Warburton printed, with notes. He also published an edition of Shakspeare, which was his worst performance in literature. a. at Newark, 1698; b. 1779.

WARBURTON, Eliot Bartholomew George, a modern Irish author, who studied at the university of Cambridge, and was also called to the bar, but did not practise, having resolved to devote his attention to his estates in the county Galway. His first appearance as an author was made in 1845, with the production of a fine work of travel, entitled "The Crescent and the Cross." "Prince Rupert and the Cavaliers" succeeded in 1849. "Reginald Hastings," a novel, the action of which was laid in the time of the civil war under Charles I., was his third publication. "Darren, or the Merchant Prince," was given to the public after his death. It is an exciting narrative of the fortunes of the colony founded in South America by Paterson. Eliot Warburton was lost in the Amazon, 1852; a. in Ireland, 1810.

WARD, Samuel, ward, a learned English divine, who, in 1600, became master of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. He was one of the divines sent to the synod of Dort, where his opinions with respect to the Calvinistic doctrines, which he had before rigorously maintained, were changed. He was imprisoned on the breaking out of the civil war. He wrote some theological pieces, and several of his letters are included in the collection of Archbishop Usher. b. 1643.

WARD, Seth, a learned English divine and mathematician, who obtained a fellowship at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, of which he was deprived for refusing to subscribe to the "Solemn League and Covenant;" but he afterwards went to Oxford, and was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy. In 1661 he became fellow of the Royal Society, and the year following bishop of Exeter; whence, in 1667, he was translated to Salisbury. His most important works were, "On the Immortality of the Soul," "A Lecture on Comets," "Geometrical Astronomy," "Exercitation on the Philosophy of Hobbes," "Discourse on the Being and Attributes of God." b. at Buntingford, Herts, 1617; d. 1689.

WARD, Edward, an English author, who wrote "The London Spy," and turned "Don Quixote" into Hudibrastic verse. b. about 1667; d. 1731.

WARD, John, an English writer, who, in 1720, became professor of rhetoric at Gresham College. He was admitted a member of the Royal Society in 1723, and became one of the vice-presidents in 1753; in the following year becoming a trustee of the British Museum, on its establishment. He wrote, among other works, "The Lives of the Gresham Professors," "Lectures on Oratory," "Dissertations on Difficult Passages of Scripture." b. in London, 1679; d. 1753.

WARD, James, an English artist, who excelled in depicting scenes of animal and rural life. He also attempted historical and allegorical subjects, but experienced a decided failure. He was elected R.A. in 1811. b. 1770; d. 1859.

WARD, Robert Plumer, an English statesman and writer, who was educated for the legal profession, and obtained a Welsh judgeship; but about 1806 relinquished the law to fulfil the duties of under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, and subsequently served as lord of the Admiralty and as clerk of the Ordnance. His leisure was devoted to literature, in which he produced, among other works, "History of the Law of Nations in Europe, from the time of the Greeks and Romans to the age of Grotius," "Historical Essay on the Revolution of 1688," "Illustrations of Human Life," and the novels of "De Vere," "Trenaine," and "De Clifford." After his death, his "Diary from the Years 1809 to 1820" was published. b. at Gibraltar, 1765; d. 1846.

WARD, Edward Matthew, a modern English artist, who became a student of the Royal Academy in 1834. Two years afterwards he repaired to Rome, where he resided till 1839, and, on his homeward journey, visited Munich, where he made a brief sojourn, for the purpose of acquiring from Cornelius, the great German painter, instruction in fresco. In 1840 he exhibited at the Royal Academy a "King Lear." His first success was obtained in 1843, by his painting called "Dr. Johnson perusing the Manuscript of the Vicar of Wakefield." After this time, his works attracted the attention of art-patrons and the public; and he continued to increase in skill and power as an artist with every fresh effort. His best productions may be cited as being, "Scene in Lord Chesterfield's Ante-room in 1748," "The Royal Family of France in the Prison of the Temple," "The Last Sleep of Argyle," and "Charlotte Corday going to Execution." He was one of the English artists selected to decorate the palace of Westminster with pictures. He became A.R.A. in 1847, and R.A. in 1855. b. in London, 1816.

Waring

WARDLAW, Henry, ward-law, bishop of St. Andrew's, and founder of the university there, was preferred to that see by pope Benedict XIII. in 1404. Though a man of strict morals and great simplicity of character, he was a still greater enemy to what he believed to be heresy than to immorality, and accordingly condemned to the stake those who questioned the doctrines of the Romish church. d. 1440.

WARDLAW, Ralph, a Scotch divine, who became professor of theology in the Independent Academy of Glasgow. He wrote a large number of sermons and essays upon theological subjects. b. at Dalketh, 1779; d. 1853.

WARE, Sir James, wa-ir, an eminent Irish antiquarian writer, who, in 1629, was knighted by the lords justices, and subsequently succeeded his father as auditor-general of Ireland. At the outbreak of the civil war in 1841, he went to England upon a mission to Charles I., at Oxford; but on his return voyage was taken prisoner, and was sent to the Tower by the Parliament. Released a few months afterwards, he returned to Dublin, but, in 1640, went to France. At the Restoration he recovered his offices. He wrote, among other important works, "History and Antiquities of Ireland," and "Annals of the Reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., and Edward VI." b. at Dublin, 1594; d. at the same city, 1668.

WARE, James, an eminent surgeon and oculist, who, after having been demonstrator of anatomy at Cambridge, practised in the metropolis and attained a first-rate reputation. He wrote, among other works, "Observations on Ophthalmia," "Remarks on Fistula Lachrymalis," and "Chirurgical Observations." b. 1756; d. 1815.

WARGENTIN, Peter William, war'-gen-tin, a Swedish mathematician, who constructed tables of the satellites of Jupiter, and wrote several papers in the "Transactions" of the Academy of Stockholm. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London. b. at Stockholm, 1717; d. at the same city, 1783.

WARHAM, William, war'-am, an eminent English prelate and statesman, who, in 1483, was sent upon an embassy to the duke of Burgundy, and on his return was advanced to the bishopric of London. He was also made lord chancellor, and in 1504 translated to the see of Canterbury. In the chancellorship, however, he was supplanted by King Henry VIII.'s favourite, Wolsey, at whose fall he was again offered the office, which he refused. Erasmus, of whom he was the patron, dedicated to the archbishop his edition of the writings of St. Jerome. b. at Okeley, Hampshire, at the close of the 15th century; d. near Canterbury, 1532.

WARREN, John, war'-in, a Flemish sculptor and engraver, who was employed in the mint at Paris, where he engraved the seal for the French Academy, which is considered as his masterpiece. The subject is Cardinal Richelieu. He also executed two busts in bronze of Louis XIV. and other fine works. b. 1604; poisoned, 1672.

WARING, Edward, wa-ir-ing, a learned English mathematician, who, in 1760, was appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics at the university of Cambridge. His most important works were, "Miscellanea Analytica," a treatise of the highest order in abstruse mathematics; some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," "Proprietates Algebraicarum Curvarum," and "Meditationes Analyticae," &c. B. near Shrewsbury, 1736; D. at Cambridge, 1798.

WARNER, Ferdinando, war'-ner, an English divine, who wrote "An Ecclesiastical History of the Eighteenth Century," "Memoirs of Sir Thomas More," "History of the Irish Rebellion," &c. B. 1703; D. 1787.

WARNER, John, an English divine and writer, son of the preceding, was chaplain to the English ambassador at Madrid. B. 1736; D. 1800.

WARNER, Richard, an English botanist, who published "Plantae Woodfordenses, or a Catalogue of Plants growing about Woodford in Essex." He was also the author of a letter to Garrick, on a glossary to Shakspeare, a subject with which he was profoundly acquainted, and translated some of the comedies of Plautus. He bequeathed his valuable library to Wadham College, Oxford, where he had received his education. B. 1711; D. 1775.

WARREN, Sir Peter, war'-ren, an able English admiral, entered the navy when young, and gradually rose to the rank of commodore. In 1745 he commanded a squadron, with which he attacked and took possession of Louisbourg; and in 1757 engaged a French squadron, which he completely defeated, capturing several of their men-of-war. This last exploit rendered him very popular, and he was elected M.P. for Westminster. B. in Ireland, 1703; D. 1752.

WARREN, Sir John Borlase, an English admiral, who served under Lord Howe upon the American station. In 1797 he defeated a small naval force which had been sent by the French to invade Ireland. On that occasion he captured a line-of-battle ship and three frigates. He was subsequently appointed ambassador to St. Petersburg, and, in 1812, for a short period commanded on the coast of America. He was a member of four Parliaments, having represented Great Marlow in those of 1774 and 1780, and Nottingham in those of 1796 and 1802. B. 1751; D. 1822.

WARREN, Charles, an eminent engraver, who for many years held a distinguished rank in his profession, and was the first who successfully overcame the difficulties of engraving on steel. B. in London; D. 1823.

WARREN, Samuel, a modern English novelist and lawyer, who acquired a reputation in light literature, as the author of "Passages from the Diary of a Late Physician," "Ten Thousand a Year," "Now and Then," &c. As a writer upon subjects connected with his profession, he produced "A Popular and Practical Introduction to Law Studies," an abridged edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, and "The Law and Practice of Election Committees." In 1856 he entered Parliament, enrolling himself in the ranks of the Conservative party; became recorder of Hull in 1854, and a Commissioner in Lunacy in 1859. B. 1807.

WARTON, Thomas, war'-ton, an English divine and poet, who became professor of poetry in the university of Oxford. His poems are pleasing. B. in Surrey, 1687; D. 1745.

WARTON, Joseph, a learned English divine and poet, the son of the preceding, who produced a volume of odes; a translation of Virgil, with notes; and an "Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope." B. at Dunsford, Surrey, 1723; D. 1800.

WARTON, Thomas, an English divine, poet, and critic, was brother of the preceding, and in 1757 became professor of poetry in the university of Oxford, and in 1771 was presented to the vicarage of Kiddingington, in Oxfordshire, of which parish he wrote an account, as the commencement of a history of the county, which, however, was never carried out. In 1735 Mr. Warton was appointed poet laureate, and also Camden professor of modern history at Oxford. He wrote some elegant poems; a "History of English Poetry," a very learned work; the "Lives of Sir Thomas Pope and Dr. Bathurst," "Notes on Milton's smaller Poems," "Observations on Spenser's Faerie Queen," &c. B. at Basingstoke, 1728; D. 1790.

WARWICK, Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of, war'-ik, called "the Good," was sent to France in 1412, at the head of 6000 men, and when the duke of Bedford returned to England, was appointed regent of France, retaining the title until the duke of Bedford's return, in 1423. He was next summoned to England by the council, and appointed governor of Henry VI. He was again sent to France as regent in 1437, and remained in that station until his death at the castle of Rouen, in 1439.

WARWICK, Henry de Beauchamp, Earl and Duke of, was nominated premier earl of England by Henry VI. in 1441, and was, in the following year, crowned by Henry himself, king of the islands of Wight, Jersey, and Guernsey. He did not remain long in enjoyment. He signalized himself in the expedition to the Scottish frontier in 1448. In 1453 he espoused the cause of the duke of York; and to his bravery was chiefly due the gaining of the battle of St. Albans in the same year. He was immediately afterwards appointed governor of Calais; and, while holding that office, defeated the fleet of the free town of Lübeck, capturing six of the vessels. In 1460 he returned to England with 1500 followers, and, on gaining London, his army had increased to 40,000 men. At the battle of Northampton, which was fought in the same year, the Lancastrians were defeated, and Henry VI. fell into the hands of the Yorkists, of which party Warwick was the main support. Queen Margaret, however, defeated the Yorkists at Wakefield, and again near St. Albans; in which latter battle Warwick commanded. In 1461 Henry VI. regained his liberty, but was compelled to retire with his army to the north, before the superior forces of Warwick and Edward duke of York. Edward entered London with Warwick, and was proclaimed king as Edward IV. The earl next commanded the main body of the Yorkist army at the battle of Towton, in Yorkshire, when the Lancastrians were defeated. After performing a series of brilliant services in the cause of the new king, and conducting Henry VI. to the Tower of London, he was rewarded with the highest honours, and indeed became the ruler of the king and the kingdom. Edward IV., however, growing uneasy under the domination of the haughty earl, formed connexions by marriage, and raised to his favour persons adverse to Warwick, who, in turn, excited revolts in the kingdom, and, at the battle of Olney, took Edward prisoner. On the after-success of the royalists, Warwick fled to France, where, meeting Margaret of Anjou, wife of Henry VI., a reconciliation was effected, which was strengthened by the marriage of the queen's son, Prince Edward, to Anne, the daughter of Warwick. Soon afterwards Warwick invaded England; and Edward IV. having fled to Holland, he proclaimed Henry VI., who had been released from the Tower, king of England. The earl was appointed chamberlain and lord high admiral of England. But in 1471 Edward IV., assisted by the duke of Burgundy, landed in Yorkshire, and gathering together an army, met the Lancastrians, under Warwick, at Barnet, when they were totally defeated, Warwick perishing in the fight. His remains were exhibited during three days in St. Paul's, and then buried in Berkshire. b. about 1420.

WARWICK, Sir Phillip, an English politician, who, in 1616, was appointed one of the king's commissioners to treat with Parliament for the surrender of Oxford, and was afterwards made secretary to Charles I. At the Restoration he became member for Westminster, and was knighted. He wrote "Memoirs of Charles I." b. in London, 1603; p. 1682.

WASHINGTON, George, washt-ing-ton, the celebrated American patriot, was descended from a family which had gone from Northampton, in England, to settle in Virginia. His father, Mr. Augustine Washington, a man of considerable landed property, died when George, who was his eldest son by a second marriage, was in his 11th year. His education, obtained at an ordinary school, comprised little more than reading, writing, and arithmetic; but between his 14th and 18th years he studied geometry and surveying, in which he made considerable progress. In his 16th year he left school, and having devoted his attention to mathematics and practical surveying, was employed by Lord Fairfax to survey his property in the Alleghany Mountains. In his 19th year he was appointed major in the provincial militia, in which capacity he was sent by General Dinwiddie, in 1753, to the French commander on the Ohio, to complain of the inroads that had been made, in violation of the treaties between the two nations. About this time he came into collision with, and defeated, a small detachment of the French forces, for which he was thanked by the House of Burgesses. In 1755 he served as colonel under the unfortunate General Braddock; on which occasion he exhibited proofs of his military courage and skill, particularly in conducting the retreat of the army, after the disastrous battle of Monongahela. He held the command of the Virginian troops till 1758, when he gave in his resignation on account of ill-health. He next served his country as a senator. When the breach between Great Britain and her colonies became widened by mutual animosity beyond all prospect of reconciliation, the eyes of his countrymen were fixed upon Washington; and accordingly, in June, 1775, he took the command of the army of America, at Cambridge, in New England. The particulars of that great revolution it is impossible here to give in detail.

Washington

The history of Washington, from this period, is the history of the American war, and must necessarily be voluminous. Suffice it to observe, that he created the American army; with the assistance of French forces, fought the English generals Howe, Clinton, Burgoyne, and Cornwallis, with various results; till, finally, he invested Cornwallis in Yorktown, and caused him to capitulate. To his intrepidity, prudence, and moderation the Americans were almost wholly indebted for the independence which was secured to them by the treaty of peace concluded in 1783. Soon after this event, Washington resigned his commission to Congress, and in his address on that occasion, the magnanimity of the hero was blended with the wisdom of the philosopher. He returned to his seat at Mount Vernon, like Cincinnatus, and set himself to complete those favourite improvements in agriculture which had been suspended. In 1789 he was elected as the president of the United States. His government was marked by that well-tempered prudence which distinguished all his conduct. Having been re-elected as president, he held office till 1797, when he again retired to his estate at Mount Vernon. One of the most satisfactory estimates of the character and intellect of the American patriot is that of President Jefferson, who says, "His mind was great and powerful, without being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of a Newton, Bacon, or Locke; and, as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder. It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination, but sure in conclusion. Hence the common remark of his coevals of the advantages he derived from councils of war, where hearing all suggestions, he selected whatever was best; and certainly no general ever planned his battles more judiciously; but, if deranged during the course of action, if any member of his plan was disarranged by sudden circumstances, he was slow in a readjustment. The consequence was, that he often failed in the field, and rarely against an enemy in station, as at Boston and York. He was incapable of fear, meeting personal danger with the calmest unconcern. Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration, was maturely weighed; refraining, if he saw a doubt; but, when once decided, going through with his purpose, whatever obstacles opposed. His integrity was the most pure, his justice the most inflexible, I have ever known; no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was, indeed, in every sense of the word, a wise, a good, and a great man. His temper was naturally irritable and high-toned; but reflection and resolution had obtained a firm and habitual ascendancy over it. . . . His person was fine, his stature exactly what one could wish. Although in the circle of his friends, where he might be unreserved with safety, he took a free share in conversation, his colloquial talents were not above mediocrity, possessing neither copiousness of ideas nor fluency of words. In public, when called on for a sudden opinion, he was unready, short, and embarrassed. Yet he wrote readily, rather diffusely, in an easy and correct style. He read little, and that only in agriculture and English history." b. at WASSE, Christopher, wass, a learned English writer, who translated Grotius's Catechism into Greek verse, and the same author's "Cynegeticon" into English. b. 1690.

WATELET, Claude Henry, vat'-lai, a learned French writer upon art subjects, was a member of the Academy and of several the finances. He wrote upon the "Art of Painting," comedies, and other pieces; but his principal work was a "Dictionary of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving." b. at Paris, 1718; d. 1786.

WATERLAND, Daniel, waw'-ter-land, a learned English theologian, who became archdeacon of Middlesex and a canon of Windsor. His principal work was "Meditation of the Doc-"Treatise on the Eucharist according to the Athanasian Creed." b. 1633; d. in London, 1740.

WATERBURY, Charles, waw'-ter-ton, a famous naturalist who spent many years in the western world, and wrote an account of his travels called "Wanderings in South America." b. near Wakefield, 1732; d. 1865.

WATSON, John, wot'-son, a learned English prelate, who at first practised as a physician but, on the accession of Queen Elizabeth, took orders. In 1572 he became dean, and in 1581 bishop of Winchester. He wrote a Latin tragedy, entitled "Absalom." b. at Ringworth, Worcestershire, about 1520; d. 1589.

WATSON, David, a learned Scotch writer who became professor of theology at St. Andrew's; but in 1747 he left that university and repaired to London. He published a literal translation of Horace, with notes. b. in Scot land, 1710; d. in London, 1758.

WATSON, Charles, an English naval commander, who, after gaining the rank of rear admiral by his distinguished services against the French, was, in 1764, appointed to co-operate with Clive in the East Indies. He took Fort Geriah, and assisted Clive to capture Chaudernagore, the principal fortress of the French in Bengal; but fell a victim to the climate shortly afterwards. b. 1714; d. 1757. The East India Company erected a monument to him in Westminster Abbey.

WATSON, Robert, a Scotch divine and historian, who became doctor of laws, and professor of rhetoric and belles lettres at St. Andrew's, and lastly principal of the United College. He wrote the "History of the Reign of Philip III. of Spain." b. at St. Andrew's Scotland, about 1730; d. about 1780.

WATSON, Sir William, an eminent English physician and botanist, who in 1741 was admitted a member of the Royal Society, to whose volumes he communicated many valuable papers on botany and electricity. In 1786 he received the honour of knighthood from his majesty. His tracts on Electricity contain some valuable facts. b. in London, about 1722; d. in the same city, 1787.

WATSON, Richard, a distinguished English prelate, was a native of Heversham, in Westmoreland; became a sizar, and afterwards fellow, of Trinity College, Cambridge; was chosen in 1761 to fill the chair of eloquence; and in 1771 succeeded to that of divinity. He displayed his political opinions in a sermon preached before the university, which was printed under the title of the "Principles of the Revolution Vindicated," and excited an unusual degree of public attention. In 1776 he printed "An Apology for Christianity," which he addressed to Gibbon. In 1782 he was made bishop of Llandaff, with permission to hold the archdeaconry of Ely, his professorship, and other ecclesiastical preferments. On this promotion, he published a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, containing a plan for equalizing church revenues. In 1796 appeared his "Apology for the Bible," written in answer to Payne's "Age of Reason." He was also the author of "Chemical Essays," "Sermons," and "Theological Essays." b. 1737; d. 1816.

WATT, James, wot, a celebrated Scotch mechanician, and the great improver of the steam-engine. It is related of him that he was "no common child;" in his 6th year he solved a geometrical problem; when he had attained his 14th, his mind was continually occupied with the prosecution of experiments in natural philosophy. According to Arago, the celebrity which was to become attached to his name as the improver of the steam-engine was foreshadowed in his earliest youth, it being customary with him to sit watching the exit of steam from the mouth of a kettle, and to experiment on the stream of vapour by making use of a teacup as a condenser. Under the paternal roof he acquired considerable skill in making and repairing the astronomical instruments used by mariners, his father vending those and other articles to the owners and captains of shipping in the port of Greenock. In his 18th year he went to Glasgow, where he resided during a year, and then proceeded to London, in order to acquire some better instruction in his business of mathematical instrument-maker than could be obtained in Scotland. He obtained an introduction to some eminent makers, and so assiduous was his application, that in a year he was enabled to write to his family "that he could construct a brass sector with a French joint, which is reckoned as nice a piece of framing work as is in the trade." In 1756 he returned to Glasgow, where, under the patronage of the university, he set up in business. It was not alone as an expert and able artificer that he won the attention of the scientific gentlemen of Glasgow; he was likewise an accomplished natural philosopher. His leisure was also devoted to mathematical inquiry, and to the acquisition of the German and Italian languages. Having, during many years, earnestly investigated the properties and powers of steam, chiefly with the view of applying it to the moving of wheel carriages, he began his immortal discoveries by improving Newcomen's steam-engine. He invented a means of condensing the steam in a separate chamber, and devised a plan, remarkable for its ingenuity and simplicity, by which he was enabled to obtain a high and uniform temperature in the cylinder. Between the years 1765-69 he continued his improvements, taking out patents for the most matured of them. He had some time previously occupied himself with surveying and civil-engineering work; and having given up his instrument-making business, resolved to make these avocations his pursuit; accordingly, he was engaged to survey a projected canal between the Forth and the Clyde, another from the Monkland coal-mines to Glasgow, and also to devise improvements in the navigation of the Clyde, the Crinan canal, as well as in the harbours of Port Glasgow, Greenock, and Ayr. Early in the year 1774 he entered into partnership with Matthew Boulton, in whose great factory at Soho he found those facilities which were requisite to enable him to perfect and manufacture his improved steam-engines. The energy and business talents of Boulton were also admirably calculated to smooth away the obstacles which stood in the way of the extensive introduction of the new engines. The narrow limits of this notice will not admit of a detailed account being given of all the progressive improvements made by the mechanical genius of Watt, aided by the commercial tact of his partner; it will suffice to say, that, after twenty years of enlightened activity, the splendid result of his labours—the perfect machine—was produced. By the year 1800, at which time he retired from business, the steam-engine was in general use throughout the United Kingdom. Among the less-elaborated inventions which emanated from him may be cited the copying-press; a steam-drying machine; improvements in bleaching, principally derived from the great French chemist Berthollet; and a machine for copying sculpture, which last was matured after he had entered his 80th year. He revised and annotated the articles "Steam" and "Steam-engine" for the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and was the author of a valuable mass of correspondence relative to his different inventions, which was published by his relative, James Patrick Muirhead. By many of the most competent judges Watt has been admitted to have been an original and enlightened speculator upon the true theory of the composition of water, a discovery which has also been claimed for Lavoisier and Cavendish. In an eulogium upon Watt by Lord Jeffrey, the writer observes, "It was by his inventions that the action of the steam-engine was so regulated as to make it capable of being applied to the finest and most delicate manufactures, and its power so increased as to set weight and solidity at defiance." Watt was a member of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, a correspondent of the French Institute, and was enrolled among the associates of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. A statue to his memory was set up in Westminster Abbey in 1824. Statues in his honour have likewise been erected at Manchester, Glasgow, and Greenock. In the eloquent words of Lord Brougham, he was one "who, directing the force of an original genius, early exercised in philosophic research, to the improvement of the steam-engine, enlarged the resources of his country, increased the power of man, and rose to an eminent place among the illustrious followers of science and the real benefactors of the world." B. at Greenock, 1736; D. at Heathfield, near Soho, 1819.

WATT, James, son of the preceding, distinguished himself as a constructor and improver of engines for steam navigation. He gave some assistance to Fulton, who afterwards introduced steam navigation into America; and, in 1817, made a voyage to Holland on board a steamer the engines of which were manufactured at the Soho works, of which he was at the head. This was the first steam-vessel that had left an English port. He was the author of a memoir of his father, in the supplement to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." B. 1769; D. at Aston Hall, Warwickshire, 1848.

WATT, Gregory, another son of the improver of the steam-engine. Devoted to the pursuits of science and literature, he left the management of the great Soho manufactory to his elder brother. He made some important researches relative to the formation of the igneous rocks, the results of which were communicated in a memoir to the Royal Society. B. 1777; D. 1804.

WATT, Robert, a Scotch bibliographer, who produced a valuable work of reference, entitled "Bibliotheca Britannica; or, a General Index to British and Foreign Literature." It is in two parts: in the first the authors are arranged alphabetically, their productions being given in chronological order, and in the second, the books are classed according to their subjects, references being supplied to the first part, where they are to be found under their author's name. He practised medicine with considerable success, became president of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, and produced some important works on the nature and treatment of diseases. B. in Ayrshire, 1774; D. at Glasgow, 1810.

WATTEAU, Antoine, wot-to, a celebrated French artist, who was at first a scene painter; but, having received instruction from Gillot, he soon excelled his master, and rising to a high reputation, became painter to the king. In 1718 he visited England, which he was obliged to quit on account of his health. He depicted theatrical scenes and rural fêtes, also marches and encampments of soldiers. "Though," says Walpole, "he fell short of the dignified grace of the Italians, there is an easy grace in his figures." B. at Valenciennes, 1684; D. 1721.

WATTS, Isaac, wote, a pious English dissenting divine, who in 1696 became tutor to the son of Sir John Hartop, and two years later was chosen assistant minister to the Independent congregation in Mark Lane, London. His principal works were, "A Treatise on Logic," an "Essay on the Improvement of the Mind," "Introduction to Astronomy and Geography," "Hymns" and a poetical version of the Psalms usually sung in dissenting congregations; and Poems, chiefly religious. B. at Southampton, 1674; D. 1758.

WATTS, Alaric Alexander, a modern English poetical writer, who, in early life, became the literary assistant to Crabbe, the writer of the "Technological Dictionary," and having put forth a small collection of poems in 1822, which obtained some success, he was appointed editor of the "Leeds Intelligencer," and subsequently of the "Manchester Courier." In 1825 he commenced the publication of the "Literary Souvenir," which was continued as an annual until 1836. This work contained contributions by Campbell, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, and was illustrated by Turner, Leslie, Roberts, and other eminent artists, the engravings being executed by Heath, assisted by the best engravers of the day. He also attempted to establish a fine-art journal, called "The Poetical Album;" but it ceased to appear after the second year. In 1833 he commenced the "United Service Gazette," of which he remained the editor until 1843. He was subsequently connected with the "Standard" and other newspapers. A collected edition of his poetical pieces appeared in 1851, with the title of "Lyrics of the Heart;" and two years

WAYNFLEET, William of, a noble prelate of the 15th century, whose real name was Patten, was a native of Wainfleet, Lincolnshire, and was educated at Winchester School, and at Oxford. He was made provost of Eton in 1443; bishop of Winchester in 1447; and lord chancellor in 1456. He was the under of Magdalen College, Oxford, and of a school at his native place. n. 14

WEBER, Samuel, web, an eminent musical composer, who was an cabinet-maker, but, by unwearied industry, acquired a thorough knowledge of the science of music. As a writer of glees, he takes rank among the best English masters. He also produced a mass, anthems, songs, &c. s. 1740; n. 1817.

WEBER, Henry William, way-bair, an architect and miscellaneous writer, who studied architecture at Edinburgh and at Jena; settled in Scotland, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. Among his works are, "Metrical Romances of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Centuries," "The Battle of Flodden Field," &c. s. at St. Petersburg, 1783; n. 1818.

WEBER, Carl-Maria von, a celebrated German musical composer, who was the son of an eminent violinist, by whom, at an early age, he was instructed in the science. In his twelfth year he published six fuguettes; and, after receiving farther instruction, wrote an opera, some songs, and sonatas. A second opera, entitled "The Wood-Girl," by him, was played in 1800. A third followed in 1801; shortly after which he went to Vienna, where he became acquainted with Haydn, and received some instruction from the Abbé Vogler. By the advice of this celebrated teacher, Weber spent two years in the study and analysis of the works of the great masters. He subsequently became music-director at Breslau, and in 1806 was requested by Prince Eugene of Wurtemberg to take up his residence at Carlsruhe. After residing with Duke Louis of Wurtemberg at Stuttgart, where he put forth a new version of "The Wood-Girl" under the title of "Sylvana," he in 1810 went upon a professional tour through Germany. In 1822 he produced at Berlin his finest opera, "Der Freischütz," which was given to the English public at the English Opera-house in 1824. An imperfect version of it also appeared at Paris, where, as in the other European capitals, it was enthusiastically received. "Euryanthe," another of his operas, was first played at Vienna in 1823. In 1825 he accepted an invitation to visit London, and wrote for the Covent Garden Theatre his "Oberon," the libretto of which was furnished by Mr. Planché. Stricken with pulmonary disease, and arriving in London during a severe wintry season, his health became shattered that he was carried away by death in a few months after coming to England. s. at Eutin, Holstein, 1786; n. in London, 1826.

WEBSTER, John, web-ster, an eminent English dramatic poet, of whose birth and education nothing is known. He at the outset of his career wrote plays with Dekker, Drayton, Heywood, and others, and in 1612 produced his first unassisted work, called "The White Devil." "The Duchess of Malfi" and "Appius and Virginia" were subsequently written. His fame as a dramatic writer is chiefly founded upon these works. An edition of his writings was produced by Mr. Dyce in 1830. Lived early in the 17th century.

WEBSTER, Noah, an eminent American lexicographer, who was educated for the legal profession, but devoted himself to the teaching of youth. He opened an educational establishment at Goshen, New York, which he designated the Farmers' Hall Academy, remaining at its head during many years. In 1793 he started a daily newspaper in New York, and was likewise very successful as the author of several elementary works, which is in several respects superior to most of the previous English dictionaries, has become very popular on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1825 he received the degree of L.L.D. from Yale College. n. at West Hartford, Connecticut, 1758; n. at Newhaven, 1813.

WEBSTER, Daniel, an eminent American orator, statesman, and lawyer, who, having studied the law, was admitted to practise in 1805. After enjoying a large practice at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, during several years, he was, in 1813, elected to Congress, where he sat until 1817, but without giving up the active pursuit of his profession. Having purchased an estate near Boston, he divided his time between its cultivation and his legal business until 1822, when he again entered Congress. In 1823 he was elected to the Senate of the United States, and in 1836 was an unsuccessful candidate for the presidency. Subsequently to his making a tour through England and France, he was appointed secretary of State under President Harrison. While holding this office, he, in 1812, negotiated with Lord Ashburton the Oregon treaty. He retired from the ministry in the following year, but again took his seat in the Senate in 1815. In 1850 he was once more nominated secretary of State, and retained the post until his death. A sound lawyer and statesman, he was also one of the greatest orators which his country has produced. s. His

WEBSTER, Thomas, a modern English painter, who was intended by his father to become a chorister in St. George's Chapel at Windsor, where he was educated; but his inclination towards pictorial art was so strongly marked that he was at length entered of the Royal Academy as a student of drawing. After carrying off the first prize for painting, in 1825, he, in the same year, exhibited his first picture, entitled "Shooting a Prisoner," with complete success. Having produced a number of excellent paintings, of which the sports and habits of youth principally formed the subjects, he was, in 1841, nominated an associate of the Royal Academy, the full honours of which establishment he acquired by election in 1846. Obtaining, like Wilkie, his subjects from the incidents of ordinary every-day life, he won a high position among the English artists by the admirable drawing, humour, and pathos with which he rendered his conceptions. Several of his finest WECHSEL, Christopher, wesh'-el, a celebrated French printer, who, in 1530, set up a press at Paris, for the printing of the works of Greek authors. His editions were remarkable for their correctness, which was owing to his employing the learned Sylburgius as his corrector for the press. b. 1572.—His son André, being a Protestant, withdrew to Bâle, where he carried on the printing business. He published a catalogue of books printed by himself and his father. b. about 1600.

WEDER, George Wolfgang, wai'-del, an eminent German physician and writer upon medicine, who was for more than 50 years professor of medicine at Jena. He was learned in oriental literature, and wrote a large number of works upon medicine, principally in Latin. b. 1645; d. 1721.

WEDGEWOOD, Josiah, wedj'-wood, celebrated as the inventor of the beautiful "Wedgwood-ware," was the son of a potter, and was himself brought up to the same business. His education appears to have been of the humblest order, but this defect he remedied by his assiduous efforts at self-improvement. After working for several years in partnership with others, at Burslem or at Stoke, he in 1759 established himself in a small manufactory at the former place, and having turned his attention to the production of ornamental articles of pottery, his business in time became a highly remunerative one. Queen Charlotte, for whom he executed a tea-service in his beautiful cream-coloured ware, appointed him her potter. Next opening an establishment in the metropolis, he became celebrated for his sculptures, vases, and copies of seals and medallions. Sir William Hamilton, among other distinguished connoisseurs, lent him antique vases, medallions, and cameos to copy. He was likewise allowed to execute imitations of the famous Portland vase, copies of which were at first sold at fifty guineas each. In the manufacture of vessels used in chemistry he was also highly successful. In 1771 he united his several manufactories into one great establishment, which he had previously formed at Etruria, near Newcastle-under-Lyme. His ware, and the fine-art copies which he produced, soon became famous throughout Europe; and having won an ample fortune by his energy and talent, he devoted it to the extension and improvement of the potter's art, which, thanks to his liberality, grew into an important branch of British industry. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society and of the Society of Antiquaries. b. at Burslem, Staffordshire, 1730; d. at Etruria, near Newcastle-under-Lyme, 1785.

WELBY, Henry, wel'-be, an extraordinary character, was born in Lincolnshire. He had owned a large estate in that county; but, an attempt having been made on his life by his brother, he formed the resolution of secluding himself from all society. He accordingly took a house in Grubb Street, London, where, during forty-four years, he lived without being seen by any one. b. 1636.

WELCKER, Frederick Gottlieb, wel'-er, an eminent German philologist, who became professor of philology and principal librarian in the university of Bonn. He was a voluminous writer, and produced, among other excellent works, a translation of a portion of the comedies of Aristophanes; dissertations upon Homer, Æschylus, Grecian literary history, and upon Greek tragedy. He was also the conductor of the "Rhenish Philological Museum." b. in the grand-duchy of Hesse, 1784.

WELDON, John, wel'-don, an eminent English musical composer, who became organist of the Chapel Royal. The parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields having chosen George J. its churchwarden, his Majesty retained the office during two months, and upon his retirement presented the church with a fine organ, Weldon, out of compliment to the king, being appointed organist. He chiefly composed sacred music; but many of his songs and lighter pieces are much admired. b. at Chichester, about 1670; d. 1738.

WELLESLEY, Richard Colley, Marquis, wel'-le, a British statesman, was the eldest son of Garret, earl of Mornington, and of Anne, his countess, who was the daughter of Arthur, Viscount Dungannon. On coming of age, he entered the Irish House of Lords, and continued to sit therein until the Union, before which event he was elected to the British House of Commons. Attracting the notice of George III., he was nominated one of the lords of the Treasury, and was eventually created a baron in the British and marquis in the Irish peerage. In 1797 he was appointed governor-general of India, a position in which he displayed great administrative talent, combined with an unusual share of promptness of action. India, when he assumed the reins of government, was in a critical condition. Bonaparte having succeeded in gaining a footing in Egypt, was apparently about to strike a blow at the English possessions in the East. Tippoo Saib was endeavouring to regain those territories which he had lost, and was in correspondence with the French. Marquis Wellesley immediately began to act. He despatched the Anglo-Indian army against Tippoo, who, after suffering defeat at Malabey, was besieged in the strong fortress of Seringapatam, which was taken, the sultan falling in the fight. Nearly all his territories were annexed to the British possessions. The governor-general next turned his attention to the finances and the general internal organization of the Indian Empire. The turbulent Mahrattas were afterwards defeated in a series of sanguinary encounters, and their power completely broken by the decisive battles of Assaye and Laszawarree. In these campaigns, the marquis's brother, Major-General Wellesley, afterwards duke of Wellington, displayed military qualities which formed a true augury of his future brilliant success as a commander. The marquis was permitted to resign the governor-generalship in 1805, and returning to England, he resumed his parliamentary career, was for a short period ambassador to Spain, and in 1809, at the request of the king, whose friendship for him was very great, undertook the office of secretary of state for foreign affairs, and held it until 1812. He remained out of office between this date and the year 1821, having, in the meanwhile, had frequent occasion to condemn the inefficient manner in which his brother was supported in the Spanish campaigns by the English ministry. During nearly seven years he held the appointment of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1833, five years after his resignation of it, was re-appointed, holding the office, on this second occasion, for about a year. His last public employment was in the second ministry of Lord Melbourne, in which he held the appointment of lord chamberlain. Marquis Wellesley was a statesman of enlarged views, and with superior talent for organization; but for party politics he had little sympathy. Like others who had held the post, his administration of the East Indian empire was bitterly attacked by his political opponents. But the measures which he inaugurated while ruling in the East ultimately proved as productive of real good as his career was brilliant while he held the government there. His despatches, minutes, and correspondence, during his administration of India, were published by Mr. Montgomery Martin in 1836: a. at Dublin, 1700; b. in London, 1842.

WELLINGTON, Arthur Wellesley, Duke of well-ing-ton, an illustrious British military commander and eminent statesman, was the third son of the earl of Mornington, by Anne, daughter of Arthur Viscount Dungannon. The family name was originally Wesley, which had been assumed by the duke's grandfather, Richard Colley, Esq., on succeeding, by bequest, in 1723, to the estates of Garret Wesley, Esq., of Dangan Castle, in the county of Meath, Ireland. As Arthur Wesley, for so he continued to style himself until 1797, at which time the paternal designation was changed to Wellesley by the first marquis, he received his education at Eton college, afterwards from a private tutor at Brighton, and finally at the military academy of Angers, in France. He obtained his first commission as ensign in the 73rd regiment of foot in 1787; at the close of the same year he became lieutenant in the 76th; early in 1778 he exchanged into the 41st, and in June of the same year was gazetted to the 12th light dragoons. Promoted to a captaincy in the 58th foot in 1791, he, in the following year, exchanged into the 18th light dragoons. In 1793 he was appointed major of the 33rd foot; and, after representing the borough of Trim, in the county of Meath, in the Irish Parliament, and afterwards acting as aide-de-camp to the earl of Westmoreland, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he in 1794 went upon his first active service as lieutenant-colonel of the 33rd regiment, having been ordered to join the forces of the duke of York in the Netherlands. The English were, however, compelled to retire before the French army under Pichegru, and in the following year, after several disasters, he embarked for England. His regiment was next ordered to the West Indies; but the ship on board which it was embarked, after experiencing some bad weather at sea, was compelled to put back to Portsmouth, and in the following year the destination of the force was changed to that of India. Meanwhile, Wellesley had become a colonel, and in 1797 he landed in India with his men. His career may be said to have commenced under the most favourable auspices; for, in 1798, his eldest brother arrived at Calcutta as governor-general of India. Tippoo Saib, sultan of Mysore, was intriguing with France and the Mahrattas to expel the English from India; the governor-general, accordingly, after some fruitless attempts at conciliation, resolved to crush the disaffected native princes. An army, under General Harris, was ordered to enter the territory of Mysore, Colonel Wellesley's regiment forming part of the force. The Nizam of the Deccan supplied a contingent to the British, and the command of this portion of the army was given to the brother of the governor-general. After defeating Tippoo's troops at Malavelly, the British marched upon Seringapatam, which was stormed and taken, the sultan being killed in the fight. In 1799 Wellesley was nominated governor of Seringapatam and of Mysore; in which position he highly distinguished himself, both in the field and as an administrator. In 1803 he fought and gained the splendid victory of Assaye, where, with 8000 men, he defeated the forces of Scindia, amounting to 30,000. He next compelled the rajah of Berar to sue for peace. The following year he repaired to Bombay, where an address was presented to him, in which he was styled as equally great in the cabinet and in the field; from the British residents at Calcutta he received a sabre worth £1000, whilst the army of the Deccan subscribed to present him with a service of plate of the value of 2000 guineas; and, having received the thanks of both houses of Parliament, and been knighted, he, in 1805, set sail for England. Towards the close of the same year, he was appointed to the command of a brigade in the German expedition under Lord Cathcart; but in a few months the English returned, without having been engaged with the enemy. In 1806 he married Lady Catherine Pakenham; in 1807 he became secretary for Ireland, was elected to the House of Commons, and, in the same year, participated in the Copenhagen expedition as brigadier, his division routing the Danes at Klogse, which town fell into his hands. Returning to England shortly afterwards, he resumed his seat in the House of Commons, and his post as secretary for Ireland. In 1808, having been made lieutenant-general, and given the command of the army to be despatched to the Peninsula, the great drama of his life was about to commence. In July of that year he landed at Corunna; but, finding that the junta of Galicia asked for money and not men, he changed his plans and sailed for Portugal, where he disembarked his troops at Mondego Bay. On receiving a reinforcement of 4000 men, under Major-General Spencer, from Cadiz, Sir Arthur Wellesley, with about 13,000 men in all, prepared to attack the French under Junot, who had with him 14,000 troops. Sir John Moore had likewise landed in Portugal, with the view of effecting a junction with Wellesley, who, however, resolved to strike a blow without waiting for his reinforcements. He marched towards Lisbon; but was superseded in the chief command by Sir Hew Dalrymple and then by Sir Harry Burrard, who had been sent out from England. This general was mild and cautious to a fault; and, despite the urgent representations of Wellesley, who declared that if the English did not attack Junot, Junot would attack them, he refused to act until Sir John Moore had come up. At Vimiera the French, as Wellesley had predicted, fell upon the English, but were gallantly repulsed, and would certainly have been cut off from Lisbon, were it not for the blundering tactics of Burrard. The Convention of Cintra was afterwards concluded, by which the French agreed to evacuate Portugal, Junot and all his troops and baggage being conveyed in English transports to the nearest French port. In disgust and disappointment Sir Arthur Wellesley resigned his command and returned to England, where he found the nation indignant at the incompetent generalship of Burrard and the diplomatic incapacity of those who had allowed Junot to retrieve by treaty what he had lost in the field. An inquiry took place; and, although everybody was admitted to have acted with zeal, firmness, and gallantry, the superiority of Wellesley as a commander, over the higher officers, was apparent, though it was not publicly avowed by those in authority. Accordingly, when, in 1809, Napoleon, after having burst into Spain, had occupied Madrid, and after Soult had marched against Sir John Moore with an overpowering force, the English nation became aroused, it was not to a Burrard or a Dalrymple that the command of the British forces was intrusted. The national enthusiasm demanded that a great blow should be struck on land, and to Sir Arthur Wellesley was given the sole command of the war. On arriving in Portugal, he took the field with a force of about 25,000 men, and immediately proceeded to drive Soult from Oporto. The French being upon the opposite side of the Douro, a rapid river, at this point nearly 300 yards across, Wellesley, by a series of manœuvres as bold as they were skilful, threw his men across the river, took up a position in a convent upon the opposite shore, met and repulsed a fierce attack by Soult, then routed him, and drove him in panic-stricken retreat through the mountains into Galicia. In that disastrous march the French marshal lost a fourth of his army, the whole of his artillery, and the greater part of his baggage. Such was the first of that grand series of brilliant victories by which the Peninsular war was marked. Sir Arthur now entered Spain, formed a junction with Cuesta, the Spanish general, and fought and won the battle of Talavera, with 22,000 Englishmen against 50,000 Frenchmen. For this victory, in which he had received no assistance from the miserable, impracticable Spanish general Cuesta, he was created Baron Douro of Wellesley, and Viscount Wellington of Talavera. But, not being able to count upon the assistance of his Spanish allies, and with four French armies bearing down upon him from all sides, he resolved to withdraw into Portugal, where, soon afterwards, he constructed the famous lines of Torres Vedras, by which he kept Lisbon in security, and dashed back the impetuous onslaught of the French with complete success. These stupendous lines of defence were double, the outer line being 29 miles long, and the inner one 24; the whole forming a series of fortified positions, extending from the ocean at Vedras to the back of Lisbon. Massena entered Portugal with 70,000 men; but finding, to his astonishment, the capital defended in such a remarkable manner, he, after a few slight attacks, which were promptly repulsed, commenced a sullen retreat. Lord Wellington sallied forth from his lines, and went in close pursuit. At Almeida Massena made a stand, but was beaten in the most rapid and skilful manner by his opponent. Having thus cleared Portugal of the French, Lord Wellington resolved to again enter Spain; but as it was of the most vital importance that Badajoz and Ciudad Rodrigo, fortresses of immense strength, and garrisoned by Frenchmen, should not remain in the hands of an enemy, the English commander determined that they should fall. And fall they did; yet not till he had met, and, after a hard-fought battle, defeated Massena, at Fuentes d'Onore;—not till he had made two unsuccessful assaults upon Badajoz;—not, finally, till he had won the stronghold, at the cost of upwards of 1000 brave English soldiers dead, and more than 3800 wounded. "When," says Napier, "the extent of the night's havoc was made known to Lord Wellington, the firmness of his nature gave way for a moment, and the pride of conquest yielded to a passionate burst of grief for the loss of his gallant soldiers." But the sanguinary work was not ended. Marmont, who had been sent to supersede Massena, was alternately advancing and retreating. Long anxious to attack him, Wellington at length took advantage of a strategic blunder committed by his adversary, and fell upon him. The battle of Salamanca was the result, and was the most decisive victory the English commander had yet won in Spain. A month later he entered Madrid in triumph, and afterwards received from his sovereign the title of marquis. With several powerful French armies in the field, each of them as numerous as his own, Wellington, having failed to take Burgos, retreated to his old quarters within the frontiers of Portugal, and there spent the winter of 1812, that winter during which Napoleon had lost 350,000 men beneath Russian snows. The campaign of 1813 opened auspiciously. The emperor, owing to his disasters in Russia, had been compelled to recall Soult from Spain, together with 20,000 men. There were thus left to oppose Wellington about 70,000 men; but there were about 100,000 more in different parts of Spain, under Suchet and other commanders. The French emperor could no longer spare large bodies of troops to pour through the Pyrenees. Wellington was aware of this, and prepared to enter upon his decisive campaign. Rapidly marching into Spain, he, by the most skilful manœuvring, caused the French to quit Madrid and Toledo, and to fall back upon Burgos, and afterwards upon the Ebro, the passage of which they prepared to defend against the English; but Wellington, anxious to spare his men, made a détour, and passed the river at a higher point. Upon this, the French again retreated, pursued by their adversaries. At Vittoria, the English came up with them. The French, under King Joseph and Marshal Jourdan, accepted battle, and were decisively routed, losing a vast amount of arms and ammunition. On hearing of this battle, Napoleon was completely dismayed, and hastily sent Soult to turn the tide of events in the Peninsula. Soult made a desperate effort to drive back the English and their Spanish and Portuguese allies; but after a series of sanguinary conflicts, k as the battles of the Pyrenees, he was forced to retreat into French territory. In November, 1813, Wellington descended into France, pursuing his conquering course to Toulouse, from which, after some severe fighting, Soult was driven. With this engagement the Peninsular war may be said to have ended; for Soult, being made aware of the fall of Napoleon, gave in his allegiance to the Bourbons. In 1814, after an absence of five years, the great commander, now the duke of Wellington, landed in England, where his reception was unprecedentedly brilliant. His next employments were diplomatic. For a short time ambassador at the restored Bourbon court at Paris, he, at the commencement of the year 1815, attended the general congress of European powers at Vienna. The deliberations of that brilliant assembly were suddenly broken up by the news that Napoleon had quitted the island of Elba, had entered France, where the army had flocked to powers sitting at Vienna immediately drew up a paper, in which Bonaparte was denounced as a disturber of the peace of the world. He was proclaimed an outlaw, and delivered over to public justice. The duke of Wellington was, at the same time, nominated commander-in-chief of the army to be concentrated in the Netherlands. In the month of April, 1815, Wellington was at Brussels, preparing for the impending contest. It had been arranged that the allied troops should be mustered on the Rhine, and it was in order to cover this general gathering, and also to protect Belgium, that Wellington decided upon fixing his headquarters at Brussels. Napoleon's object, on the other hand, was to crush the English army, and to drive back whatever Prussian troops might have entered Flanders, before the great concentration of the allies could take place. Wellington had under him about 40,000 British and Hanoverians, and 36,000 Germans and Belgians. The Prussians, amounting to 50,000, were at Namur, under Marshal Blücher. By indefatigable exertions, Napoleon had collected a force of 120,000 men. On the 16th of June the French under Napoleon attacked Blücher at Ligny, and penetrated to the centre of his position; but the Prussians fought with great obstinacy until nightfall, when Blücher retired in the best order to Wavre. On the same day Marshal Ney attacked Wellington at Quatre Bras, but failed in all his attempts to carry the position. In consequence of Blücher's retrograde movement upon the Wavre, Wellington retired to a position facing the village of Waterloo, crossing the high roads from Brussels to Charleroi and Nivelles. In front, he held the house and gardens of Hougomont; on his left centre, he held the farm of La Haye Sainte. Napoleon concentrated his forces upon a range of heights looking upon this position, and, having despatched his third corps to observe the Prussians, he, about one o'clock on the 18th of June, commenced the fight with an impetuous attack upon the post at Hougomont. This attack was renewed again and again throughout the whole of the day; but the post was gallantly kept against every onslaught by the Guards, and remained in their hands. Simultaneously, Napoleon sent against the British position heavy columns of infantry, intermixed with cavalry, and supported by powerful artillery, which kept up a deadly fire. There was no manœuvring throughout the day. Napoleon's tactics were to pour against the whole British line a furious cannonade, and to launch against it heavy charges of infantry and cavalry. But in all these attacks he could make no impression upon the British infantry. These desperate encounters were maintained until about seven o'clock in the evening, at which time, the French having succeeded in carrying the post of La Haye Sainte from the Hanoverians, and the Prussian guns being heard on his right, Napoleon resolved to make a last desperate effort to overpower the British left centre, and ordered his Guard to advance. The brave Guard came forward in column, and halting at the distance of 50 yards from the English, attempted, under a murderous fire, to deploy; but, in the effort, they became broken into confused masses, the British musketry creating terrible havoc among them. They wavered, and then recoiled in hopeless confusion. At this moment the duke of Wellington moved forward his whole line, and, sweeping all before him, drove the French from their position, and captured their entire artillery and baggage. The Prussians having arrived just as the French had been routed, the duke of Wellington halted his invincible troops in the field, and allowed Blücher to take up the pursuit of the panic-stricken French. With the victory of Waterloo the great continental war came to a termination, having lasted during twelve years. On his return to England, the duke of Wellington was received with all the honours that a grateful and enthusiastic nation could devise. In addition to the sums he had already received—about half a million—a grant of £200,000 was voted for the purchase of the mansion and estate of Stratfieldsaye, in Hampshire. With the year 1822 the duke entered upon his life as a statesman. Of this portion of his career, honesty and sagacity were the main characteristics; and if he at first opposed innovation and change, it was from a fear that the constitution might be endangered by the efforts of mere theorists, with whom throughout his life he had no sympathy. He was twice secretary of state, and once prime minister; and to the last hour of his life may be said to have laboured for his country. That England was not unmindful of the merits of her greatest military commander is attested by the honours and rewards which she heaped upon him; and at his death his remains were interred, with every public honour, by the side of his illustrious fellow-hero, Nelson, in St. Paul's cathedral. n. either at Dungen Castle, Meath, or at Dublin, 1769; d. at Walmer Castle, Kent, 1852.

WELLS, Edward, sc. a learned English divine, who published, among other works, an answer to Dr. Clarke on the Trinity; pamphlets against the Dissenters; and a valuable work on the Geography of the Old and New Testaments. n. at Corsham, Wiltshire, about 1665; d. 1730.

WELLWOOD, Thomas, sc. a Scotch physician, who became king's physician for Scotland to William III. He wrote, "Memoirs of English Affairs from 1548 to the Revolution." n. near Edinburgh, 1652; d. 1716.

WELSTED, Leonard, sc. an English poet, who produced several poems of merit, but was satirized by Pope in the "Dunciad," in the following lines:—

He translated "Longinus on the Sublime," and wrote a comedy called "The Dissembled Wanton;" and is said to have been secretly employed as a political writer by Sir Robert Walpole. B. at Abington, Northamptonshire, 1689; D. 1747.

WENCESLAUS, or WENZEL, went'-zel, emperor of Germany, and king of Bohemia, was the son of Charles IV., whom he succeeded in 1378. He was a dissolute and cruel prince, and during his reign John Huss was burned; which ruthless act gave rise to the dreadful Hussite war. B. 1361; D. 1410.

WENTWORTH, Thomas. (See STRAFFORD, Earl of.)

WERNER, Abraham Gottlob, vair'-ner, an eminent German mineralogist, who studied at the famous school of mines at Freiberg, in Saxony, and in 1775 was appointed inspector of the mineralogical cabinet and professor of mineralogy in that city. By his lectures and his writings he won a position at the head of the most celebrated mineralogists of his time. His principal works were, "Theory of the Formation of Veins," a treatise on the external character of minerals, and "The Classification and Description of Mountains." B. at Weslau, Upper Lusatia, 1750; D. at Dresden, 1817.

WERNER, Frederick Louis Zacharias, an eminent German dramatist, who was engaged at Warsaw and at Berlin in the diplomatic service of Prussia. He subsequently became a convert to Roman Catholicism at Rome, and next took orders at Vienna. His best productions were, "The Cross on the Baltic," "Martin Luther," and "Attila." B. at Königsberg, 1768; D. at Vienna, 1823.

WERNER, Joannes, a German mathematician, who in 1514 produced "Annotations on the First Book of Ptolemy's Geography," a treatise on the movement of the eighth sphere, and other works. B. 1468; D. 1528.

WESLEY, or WESTLEY, Samuel, wes'-le, an English divine, who was educated as a dissenter, but subsequently conformed to the Established Church, and wrote some tracts against his old connexions. He obtained the living of South Ormsby in Lincolnshire, and afterwards Epworth in the same county. He wrote a number of poems, which were ridiculed by Garth and other wits. His principal works were, "The Life of Christ," a poem; the "History of the New Testament in verse;" and some verses upon the victory of Blenheim, for which he obtained the chaplaincy of a regiment from the duke of Marlborough. B. probably at Preston, about 1669; D. 1735.

WESLEY, Samuel, an English divine, who was son of the preceding, held the under-mastership of Westminster School during many years, and afterwards became master of the school at Tiverton, in Devonshire. He wrote the "Battle of the Sexes," and other ingenious poems. B. at Epworth, Lincolnshire, about 1682; D. at Tiverton, Devonshire, 1739.

WESLEY, John, a celebrated English divine, who with Whitefield, founded Methodism. He was the son of Samuel Wesley the elder, and was educated at the Charterhouse; whence he removed to Christchurch College, Oxford; but in 1726 was chosen fellow of Lincoln College, where he became an eminent tutor. In 1730 he and his brother, with a few other students, formed themselves into a small society for the purpose of mutual edification in religious exercises. They devoted their leisure to visiting the prisons and the sick, took the communion once a week, and fasted upon two out of every seven days. An association thus rigidly occupied with religious duties excited considerable notice; and, among other names bestowed upon the members, that of Methodists was applied to them with such success, as to subsequently become the distinctive appellation of all their followers. Deeming Oxford a sphere not large enough for his labours, Wesley, with some others, went to Georgia, in North America, in 1735, with a view of converting the Indians. After a stay there of nearly two years, he returned to England, commenced preaching to open-air meetings, and gathered many followers. The churches being shut against him, he built spacious meeting-houses in London, Bristol, and other places. For some time he was united to George Whitefield; but differences arising on account of the doctrine of election, which was zealously espoused and preached by the latter, they separated, and the Methodists were denominated according to their respective leaders. Wesley was indefatigable in his labours, and was almost continually engaged in travelling over England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. No man ever laboured more zealously or continuously in the cause which he had undertaken. Every moment of his life was devoted to the organization of the great sect of Methodists, and he preserved his influence over it to the last. He published hymns, sermons, political tracts, and controversial pieces against the Calvinists and Moravians; but the complete list of the writings of this extraordinary man is too voluminous to be inserted. Two collected editions of his works have been published, the first in 32 vols., and the second in 16 vols. The best biographies of him are those of Coke and More, and Southey. His preaching was extemporaneous, but not vehement. He dwelt much upon practical religion, though he taught his followers to seek inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and to aspire to a state of sinless perfection. B. at Epworth, Lincolnshire, 1703; D. in London, 1791.

WESLEY, Charles, an English divine, and younger brother of the preceding, was one of the first Methodists, and continued a constant preacher among them to his death. He wrote several hymns, and other pious pieces of great excellence. B. at Epworth, 1703; D. in London, 1788.

WESLEY, Charles, an eminent English musical performer, who was the son of the preceding, excelled as a player of the organ and harpsichord, and while still young, was frequently engaged to perform Handel's music before George III. He became organist to St. George's, Hanover Square. B. 1757; D. 1815.

WESLEY, Samuel, an eminent English musician, and brother of the preceding, was a man of extensive learning, and his musical powers were of the highest order. He composed a complete cathedral service, and other works. B. 1706; D. 1837.

WESSEL, or WESSELUS, John, wes'-sel, a learned Dutch divine, a man of the profoundest learning. His merit became known to Pope Sixtus

IV., who invited him to Rome, and promised him whatever he should require. Wesselus contented himself with asking for a Hebrew and Greek Bible from the Vatican library. He sought to root out the errors which were rife in the Roman Catholic Church, and, indeed, is regarded as the precursor of Luther. Many of his works were burnt in the manuscript, as heretical; but some of them were printed at Groningen in 1614. b. 1410; d. 1439.

West, Richard, west, an eminent English

dukes of Bedford and Newcastle, the earls of Egremont and Carlisle, and the marquiss of Lansdowne, he produced some remarkable pieces of sculpture. He assisted Flaxman and Baily in executing the friezes for the Marble Arch, now at Cumberland Gate. His fame chiefly rests upon his monumental statues of Addison, Pitt, Fox, &c., in Westminster Abbey; of General Fakenham, Lord Collingwood, and Sir Ralph Abercromby, in St. Paul's Cathedral. The statues of Lord Erskine, in Lincoln's Inn; Fox, in Bloomsbury-square; Francis, duke of "Treatise on the of Creating Peers." d. 1726.

West, Gilbert, an eminent English writer, who became treasurer of Chelsea Hospital, through the favour of William Pitt, afterwards Earl Chatham. In 1747 he printed his valuable work in vindication of the truth of our Saviour's resurrection, for which the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws. He also published a translation of Pindar into English verse, some elegant poems, and translations from Euripides and Plato. b. 1706; d. 1766.

West, Benjamin, a celebrated American painter, who became president of the Royal Academy of London. He gave evidence of his talents as early as his 7th year, and having continued to labour assiduously, he set up as a portrait-painter at Philadelphia when only 18. In 1760 he visited Italy, and afterwards repaired to London, where he was so fortunate as to acquire the favour of George III., who during forty years held him in great esteem. For the king and several of the English nobility he painted a number of historical pictures. At the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he was, in 1792, nominated president of the Royal Academy. His best works were, "The Death of Wolfe," well known by Woollett's fine engraving; "Penn Treating with the Indians;" "St. Paul on the Isle of Melita," in the chapel of Greenwich Hospital; and "Cromwell Dismissing the Long Parliament." b. at Springfield, Pennsylvania, U.S., 1738; d. in London, 1820. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral.

West, Thomas, an English topographical writer, who wrote "The History of Furness Abbey," and a "Guide to the Lakes." b. 1716; d. at Ulverstone, Lancashire, 1779.

WESTALL, Richard, west-all, an English painter, who produced some fine historical pictures, but was principally employed by publishers to illustrate standard works. b. at Hertford, 1765; d. 1836.

WESTALL, William, an English painter, and brother of the preceding. When a young man, he accompanied Captain Flinders as draughts-also from his chisel. The statue of Achilles, inscribed to the duke of Wellington, and erected in Hyde Park, was likewise modelled by him; but this latter may be pronounced as the least meritorious of his many works. He was elected a R.A. in 1816. b. in London, 1775; d. 1856.

WESTMACORT, Richard, a modern English sculptor, and son of the preceding, acquired the rudiments of his art under his father, and subsequently studied Greek and Roman art in Italy. His finest works were, "David as the Slayer of Goliath," the busts of Sir R. Murchison and Sydney Smith, "Venus instructing Cupid," and "The Cymbal-player," produced for the duke of Devonshire. The relief of the Royal Exchange was likewise executed by him. The articles on sculpture, in the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," and the sculpture to the Royal Academy. b. in London, 1799.

WESTMORLAND, Mildmay Fane, Earl of, west-mor-land, an English nobleman and poet, who, at the outbreak of the civil war, espoused the cause of Charles I., but subsequently sided with the Parliament. At the Restoration, which he supported, he became a favourite with Charles II., who nominated him joint lord-lieutenant of Northamptonshire. He was the author of a volume of elegantly-written poems, entitled "Otia Sacra." b. about 1600; d. 1665.

WESTMORLAND, John Fane, eleventh Earl of, an English diplomatist, who at first followed the profession of arms, serving in the Peninsula as aide-de-camp to the duke of Wellington. In 1814 he entered upon his diplomatic career, as British envoy at the court of Florence. During the interval 1841-61, he held the post of English ambassador at the court of Berlin, and, in the latter year, succeeded to the same post at the Austrian court, where, in 1855, he was replaced by Sir Hamilton Seymour. An accomplished musician himself, he was a warm patron of the art. b. 1784; d. 1859.

WESTON, William, west-ton, rector of Campden, in Gloucestershire, was the author of two WESTMACORT, Sir Richard, west-ma-kot, an eminent English sculptor, who derived his first instructions in art from his father; after which he pursued a distinguished career as a student in Italy, receiving lessons from the celebrated Canova at Rome. In 1795 he was elected a member of the Academy at Florence, and, after his return to England, was employed by the most distinguished patrons of art. For the

some of the most remarkable Wonders of Antiquity." b. 1700.

WESTON, Stephen, an eminent classical scholar and orientalist, was educated at Eton, and Exeter College, Oxford; obtained the living of Mamhead, Devon, in 1777; but resigned his ecclesiastical preferment in 1790, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. Among his numerous works are, "A Specimen of the Conformity of the European Languages, particularly the English, with the Oriental Languages," "Letters from Paris," 2 vols., "Specimen of a Chinese Dictionary," besides various translations from the Chinese and Persian, in prose and poetry; sermons, tales, and works relative to philology, divinity, and antiquities. b. 1747; d. 1830.

WETHERELL, Sir Charles, weth'-er-el, a distinguished chancery lawyer, received his education at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1794 was called to the bar. For many years he practised, though but with moderate success, at the common law bar, and then betook himself to the court of chancery. In 1818 Mr. Wetherell obtained a seat in Parliament as member for Shaftesbury; and though he displayed much talent and energy in debate, "his slovenly attire, uncouth gestures, patchwork phraseology, fanciful illustrations, odd theories, recondite allusions, and old-fashioned jokes, tempted men to call him a buffoon when they ought to have admired his ingenuity, revered his learning, and honoured his consistency." From 1820 to 1828 Sir Charles represented the city of Oxford; subsequently he sat for Plympton; and in 1830 was elected for Boroughbridge, which was disfranchised by the reform act. In 1824 he was appointed solicitor-general, and received the honour of knighthood. Three years afterwards he succeeded Sir John Copley as attorney-general, but resigned when Mr. Canning became premier. He came into office once more in 1828, under the duke of Wellington, but remained only 15 months, being determinedly opposed to Catholic emancipation. He was an inveterate opponent of reform, and on the borough he represented being disfranchised, closed his senatorial life exclaiming, "This is the last dying speech and confession of the member for Boroughbridge." Sir Charles held the office of recorder of Bristol; and his great unpopularity, as the marked opponent of the reform bill, rendered him so obnoxious in that city, that when he appeared there to hold the Michaelmas sessions for 1831, his carriage was surrounded by an infuriated mob, who hooted at and pelted him with stones; and serious riots and burnings took place on the following day and night. Sir Charles, however, escaped uninjured, and fulfilled the duties of his office until his death. b. 1770; d. 1846.

WETSTEIN, John James, wet'-stine, a learned German divine and writer, who devoted his life to biblical researches, and produced a valuable edition of the Greek New Testament; a defence of the authenticity and genuineness of the same work; and "Prolegomena." b. at Bâle, 1693; d. at Amsterdam, 1764.

WEYER, Sylvain van de, vai'-er, an eminent Belgian writer and statesman, who was educated for the practice of the law, but became librarian to the city of Brussels. Having written with great fervour in support of the popular cause, he was deprived of this latter post in 1830; but after the Belgian revolution, which occurred a few months later, was appointed envoy to the English court. Upon the establishment of the kingdom of Belgium, he became minister of foreign affairs. Subsequently he was nominated ambassador to the English court, and in 1845 was named prime minister by King Leopold; but, in the following year, resumed his ambassadorial functions in London. As a writer upon art and politics, he achieved the highest success; for the Philobiblon Society of London he wrote and composed a series of valuable treatises upon the English authors who have written in the French language. b. at Louvain, 1803.

WEYSE, Christopher Ernest Frederick, ryse, a dramatic and lyric composer of great eminence, who to his musical studies added a diligent cultivation of philosophy, astronomy, medicine, and languages, and produced numerous works. He wrote "Floribella" and "Kenilworth," two excellent operas; "An Adventure in the Garden of Rosenberg," a comic operetta; an immense number of songs, which are everywhere sung by the peasantry of Sweden, where he found constant patronage. It was chiefly, however, in oratorios and other sacred music that he excelled; of which his "Sacrifice of Jesus," and "Pentecost," are favourable specimens. b. 1774; d. 1842.

WHARTON, Sir George, whaw'-ton, an English astrologer, who inherited a fortune, but spent the greatest part of his patrimony in defence of Charles I.; and, after the ruin of the royal cause, wrote a number of almanacs, astronomical tracts, a chronology of remarkable events, and other works. He was also the author of some doggrel verses. Subsequently to the Restoration, he was created a baronet, and made treasurer of the Ordnance. b. in Westmoreland, about 1620; d. 1681.

WHARTON, Anne, an English lady, distinguished for her poetical talents, in the reign of Charles II. She was wife of Thomas, marquis of Wharton, and wrote several poems, which are included in Dryden's and Nichols's collections. b. 1635.

WHARTON, Henry, a learned English divine, became chaplain to Archbishop Sancroft, who gave him a vicarage in Kent. His principal works were, a "Treatise on the Celibacy of the Clergy, against the Church of Rome;" "Specimens of Errors in Burnet's History of the Reformation;" "Anglia Sacra," which was an historical account of the archbishops and bishops that held office in England from the introduction of Christianity; and a learned work, entitled "A Defence of Pluralities." b. at Worstead, Norfolk, 1664; d. at Newton, Cambridgeshire, 1695.

WHARTON, Thomas, Marquis of, an English statesman, who became a prominent member of the Whig party, and, with his father, was the first who went over to the cause of William III., on his landing in 1688. He was soon afterwards nominated comptroller of the household, and a member of the privy council. In the reign of Anne, and during the ascendancy of the Tory ministry, he was in opposition; but after his party obtained power, he was employed as one of the commissioners that settled the treaty of union with Scotland. He was subsequently appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. After the accession of George I. to the throne, he became lord privy seal, and received the title of Marquis of Wharton. He was known amongst his own party as "Honest Tom Wharton." He is stated to have been the author of the famous political ballad called "Lillibullero." b. about 1640; d. in London, 1715.

WHARTON, Philip, Duke of, was son of the preceding, under whose direction he was educated upon strictly Presbyterian principles; but upon the death of his parents he discarded his tutor, and going abroad, paid court to the Chevalier St. George, commonly called the Pretender, who dignified him with the title duke of Northumberland. He soon afterwards returned home, made his peace with government, and was created duke of Wharton. After this he joined the opposition, and established weekly paper called the "True Briton." Having reduced his fortune by his extravagances, he again went abroad, where he attached himself to the Pretender, and where his extraordinary career was marked by a continual course of dissipation. Pope, in his essay commencing "Wharton, the scorn and wonder of our days," depicts his character. B. 1698-n. in Spain, 1731.

WHEATLEY, William, whait'-le, a learned English divine, who published a number of sermons with quaint titles, but of considerable excellence, a "Treatise on Marriage," and an "Exposition of the Commandments." B. at Danbury, Oxfordshire, 1583; d. 1639.

WHEATLEY, Dr. Richard, a modern English prelate and learned writer, pursued a distinguished career at the University of Oxford, where, in 1825, he was nominated principal of St. Alban's Hall. In 1830 he became professor of political economy at the same seat of learning, and, in the following year, was consecrated archbishop of Dublin, in which position he distinguished himself as a churchman of liberal and enlightened views. He wrote voluminously, many of his productions being esteemed as of the highest excellence. For the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana" he wrote his two celebrated works, "The Elements of Logic" and "The Elements of Rhetoric," treatises which have been more often reprinted than any similar works. Besides a large number of eloquent sermons and charges to his clergy, he wrote "Essays on some of the Dangers of Christian Faith," "Introductory Lectures upon St. Paul's Epistles," "Thoughts on the New Dogma of the Church of Rome," &c. Apart from theology, he produced, among other excellent works, "Introductory Lectures to Political Economy," "Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon Bonaparte," and "English Synonyms." B. in London, 1787; d. 1863.

WHEARE, Degory, weer, an English historical writer, who became Camden professor of history, and principal of Gloucester Hall, Oxford. His works were composed in the Latin language, but one of them was translated into English by Edmund Bohun. B. at Jacobstow, Cornwall, 1573; d. 1647.

WHEATLEY, Charles, whet'-le, an English divine, who obtained a fellowship of St. John's College, Oxford. His principal works were, "A Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer," "Answer to Hoadly on the Sacrament," and "Miscellaneous Sermons." B. in London, 1686; d. in Hert, 1742.

WHEATLEY, Francis, an English painter, who became a member of the Royal Academy of London; and, besides many excellent works, produced a remarkable one depicting the London riots of 1780, which was engraved by James Heath for Alderman Boydell. B. in London, 1747; d. 1801.

WHEATON, Henry, whet'-ton, an American diplomatist and writer upon international law, who, having studied jurisprudence in his native country, repaired to London, where, as well as in Paris, he greatly enlarged his acquaintance with the civil law. Returning to America, he commenced practice, and in 1815 became a judge of the Marine Court. In 1821 he was one of the convention for revising the constitution of New York. During the interval 1827 to 1834, he acted as first chargé d'affaires at the Danish court; and, from the year 1837 until 1846, he represented his country as minister-plénipotentiaire to Prussia. He had been appointed professor of International law in Harvard university, and was preparing to enter upon his functions when he was carried off by death. His principal works were, "Elements of International Law;" "History of the Law of Nations in Europe and America, from the earliest times to the Treaty of Washington;" "History of the Northmen, or Danes and Normans, from the earliest times to the conquest of England;" and a "Description of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark." B. at Providence, Rhode Island, U.S., 1785; d. 1848.

WHEATSTONE, Charles, whet'-stone, an eminent English natural philosopher, who introduced and gave a practical application to the electric telegraph in England, and claimed the merit of having invented the stereoscope. He was brought up to, and for a time followed, the business of a manufacturer of musical instruments. Possessed of great mechanical ingenuity, and having a strong predilection for philosophical research, he at an early age made some important experiments on sound, the results of which were published in the "Annals of Philosophy" for 1823. He next occupied himself with investigations relative to the philosophy of light, of optics, and of electricity. In all these departments of philosophical inquiry he met with the most brilliant success; his experiments, apparatus, and discoveries being of the most ingenious and valuable character. His reputation was soon established, and in 1834 he obtained the post of professor of experimental philosophy in King's College, London. In 1836 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, to which body he, in 1838, made known the beautiful invention of the stereoscope, in a paper entitled "Contributions to the Physiology of Vision." But the application of electricity as a means of affording telegraphic communication between distant places had been a favourite one with natural philosophers for more than half a century. It is asserted that in 1834 Professor Munk, of Heidelberg, taking advantage of what had been previously done by other electricians, produced and described an electric telegraph. In 1836 he is said to have explained the whole thing to Mr. Cooke, then engaged in the Anatomical Museum at Heidelberg; in preparing wax models for the university of Durham. This gentleman at once perceived the importance of the discovery, and early in 1837, having nearly completed a system of apparatus for an experiment on the line of the Manchester and Liverpool Railway, he was introduced to Professor Wheatstone, who was engaged upon the same subject, and had made some important discoveries in connexion therewith. These gentlemen at once entered into an alliance, and together they perfected and applied the electric telegraph. There are no less than six claimants for the honour of having invented the electric telegraph as a practical reality—Wheatstone, Alexander, Steinhilber, and Morse; but Wheatstone is admitted to have produced his invention at a prior date to all the others. With respect to the relative claims of Professor Wheatstone and Mr. Cooke, an eminent authority, Professor Daniell, may be quoted. He says: "Whilst Mr. Cooke is entitled to stand alone as the gentleman to whom this country is indebted for having practically introduced and carried out the electric telegraph as a useful undertaking, promising to be a work of national importance, and Professor Wheatstone is acknowledged as the scientific man whose profound and successful researches had already prepared the public to receive it as a project capable of practical application, it is to the united labours of two gentlemen so well qualified for mutual assistance that we must attribute the rapid progress which this important invention has made during the few years since they have been associated." To the "Proceedings" of the Royal Society, and to the "Philosophical Transactions," Professor Wheatstone contributed a number of papers, upon Optics, Electricity, and also upon various improvements in connexion with the electric telegraph. At the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1855 he was one of the jurors in the section for heat, light, and electricity. With Professor Daniell, and other eminent scientific men, he formed one of the commission which made the selection of magnesian limestone for building the New Palace of Westminster. For a detailed account of Professor Wheatstone's labours, the student is referred to a paper in vol. xi. of the "Proceedings" of the Institution of Civil Engineers, entitled "The Electric Telegraph; its History, Theory, and Practical Application." Professor Wheatstone was a knight of the Legion of Honour, and member of the chief scientific bodies of Europe. n. at Gloucester, 1802.

WHEELER, Rev. Sir George, wheel'-er, an English divine and baronet, who travelled in the Levant, and upon his return presented several valuable relics of antiquity, collected in his travels, to the university of Oxford. He entered into orders, and was presented to a vicarage in Hampshire and a rectory in Durham. His most important works were, "A Journey into Greece," "An Account of the Churches and Places of Assembly of the Primitive Christians," and "The Protestant Monastery; or, Christian Economies." n. at Breda, 1630; p. 1724.

WHEATSTONE, George, wheel'-ston, an English poet and miscellaneous writer, who inherited a fortune, but dissipated it in endeavouring to obtain a court appointment. He next enlisted as a common soldier, fought in the Netherlands, and was present when Sir Philip Sidney received his death-wound at Zutphen. Later in life he was a farmer; but having failed in that capacity, he went upon a voyage to Newfoundland. Finally he endeavoured to gain a livelihood by his pen. He was the author of a comedy called "Promus and Cassandra," the plot of which was the same as that of "Measure for Measure." He was likewise an industrious writer of prose. Lived towards the close of the 16th century.

WHARWELL, Rev. Dr. William, wha'-wel, a modern English philosopher, who became master of Trinity College, Cambridge, was the son of a carpenter, and was himself intended for the same trade; but having distinguished himself whilst a scholar of the free grammar-school of Lancaster, the head-master of that establishment procured him the means of proceeding to the university of Cambridge, where he was nominated, in succession, fellow of Trinity College, professor of mineralogy, professor of moral theology, and, in 1841, master of Trinity. A man of multifarious knowledge and powerful intellect, he contributed greatly to the advancement of science. His principal works were, "History of the Inductive Sciences," "The Elements of Morality, including Polity," and "The Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences." A remarkable work upon "The Plurality of Worlds" was likewise attributed to him. n. at Lancaster, 1795; p. 1806.

WHICHCORE, Dr. Benjamin, wich'-kote, a learned English divine, and one of the chief founders of the Latitudinarians in the English church, who became provost of King's College, Cambridge, but was removed at the Restoration. He was afterwards minister of St. Anne's, Blackfriars; upon the burning of which church during the great fire of London, in 1666, he was presented to the vicarage of St. Lawrence-Jewry. His works principally were, sermons, moral and religious aphorisms, and "Observations and Apophthegms." n. at Stoke, Shropshire, 1610; p. at Cambridge, 1638.

WHISTON, William, whis'-ton, a celebrated English divine and mathematician, was educated first at the free school at Tanworth, and removed thence to Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his degree in arts. He afterwards became domestic chaplain to Dr. Moore, bishop of Norwich, who gave him the living of Lowestoft. In 1703 he succeeded Sir Isaac Newton as Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge, in which office he read lectures on his great predecessor's principles of philosophy. About this time he began to oppose the doctrine of the Trinity, and conducted himself with so much imprudent zeal in the controversy, that he was deprived of the professorship, and expelled the university. He then retired to London, where he supported himself by teaching mathematics, reading lectures, and writing books. He was a man of considerable learning, but excessively credulous, notwithstanding his want of faith in the Trinity. His principal works were, "A New Theory of the Earth;" "Astronomical Lectures;" "Translation of Josephus;" "Astronomical Principles of Religion;" "History of the Old and New Testaments;" and "Memoirs" of his own life. n. near Twycross, Leicestershire, 1667; p. in London, 1752.

WHITAKER, Rev. John, whit'-a-ker, an eminent English historical writer, who became fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and produced a number of valuable works, the principal of which were, "History of Manchester;" "Mary Queen of Scots vindicated;" "The Course of Hannibal over the Alps ascertained;" and "The Origin of Arianism disclosed." He was also a contributor to the "Anti-Jacobin Review," the "British Critic," and the "English Review." n. at Manchester, about 1735; p. 1808.

WHITTAKER, Rev. Thomas Dunham, an eminent English antiquarian writer, who received his education at St. John's College, Cambridge, and produced a number of learned and interesting works, the most important of which were, a portion of the "History of Yorkshire;" "Duculus Leodimensis, or the Topography of Leeds;" "An Account of the Rebellion of 1745;" and "History of the Decemry of Craven."

Whitby

White

He also contributed some valuable papers upon antiquarian matters to the opening volumes of the "Quarterly Review." n. at Rainham, Norfolk, 1759; p. 1821.

WHITE, Rev. Daniel, whit-be, a learned English divine, who became fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and a prebend in the Cathedral of Salisbury. He wrote a large number of controversial books; but is chiefly known by an excellent work in refutation of Calvinism, and by his Paraphrase and Exposition of the New Testament. n. at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1833; p. at Salisbury, 1726.

WHITE, Sir Thomas, white, founder of St. John's College, Oxford, was born at Reading; became an opulent London tradesman; and, in 1553, served the office of lord mayor, and received the honour of knighthood for preserving the peace of the city during Wyatt's rebellion. n. 1492; p. 1566.

WHITE, Francis, a learned English prelate, who became almoner to the king, dean, and bishop of Carlisle, whence, in 1631, he was translated to Norwich. This bishop distinguished himself by his writings against popery, and in a conference with Fisher, the Jesuit, in the king's presence, in 1621. n. about 1577; p. 1637.

WHITE, John, usually styled "the Patriarch of Dorchester," was highly esteemed for his preaching and sanctity. n. 1574; p. 1618.

WHITE, Thomas, or, as he preferred to call himself, Albinus, a philosopher and divine of the Roman church, was particularly intimate with Hobbes, though, as philosophers, their opinions widely differed. His works are remarkable for their subtlety about trifling matters. n. in Essex, about 1600; p. 1676.

WHITE, Robert, an eminent English engraver, who studied his art under David Loggan. He engraved the first Oxford almanac in the year 1674, and, says Walpole, engraved more portraits and frontispieces than any other artist of his time. n. in London, 1645; p. 1704.

WHITE, George, an eminent English engraver, and son of the preceding, was instructed in his profession by his father, many of whose unfinished plates were completed by the son, after Robert White's death. He particularly excelled in producing mezzotint engravings of portraits. The most noted of these were Colonel Blood, Lord Clarendon, the Duke of Ormond, Sir Richard Blackmore, and Jack Sheppard. p. about 1734.

WHITE, Jeremy, an English nonconformist divine, who became fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and household chaplain to Oliver Cromwell. He was a man of considerable humour and resources, but was outwitted by Cromwell, for whose daughter he had an affection; and, being one day on his knees before her, was suddenly caught in that position by the Protector, who demanded the reason. White replied, that he had been long paying his addresses to the lady's maid, but without avail, on which account he was soliciting her mistress's interest. Cromwell, immediately turning to the girl, demanded why she refused Mr. White; and without ceremony, ordering a clergyman to be called, they were married on the spot. After the Restoration, White retired into private life. He wrote a remarkable work, entitled "The Restoration of all Things." It is a defence of the notion that all men will be finally saved. n. 1629; p. 1707.

WHITE, James, a native of Ireland, was educated at the university of Dublin, and wrote "Conway Castle, and other Poems;" "Earl Strongbow," a romance; "Adventures of John of Gaunt;" "Richard Cœur de Lion," &c. p. 1799.

WHITE, Rev. Gilbert, author of the celebrated "Natural History of Selborne," was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1744. From his earliest youth he evinced a love for the study of natural history, and accordingly retired, while still young, to his native village of Selborne, where he spent the remainder of his life in the tranquil enjoyment of his beloved pursuit. He was an enthusiastic lover of nature, and wrote with the greatest elegance; his book has thus become one of the English classics. There are many editions of this delightful work; but the best, and perhaps the only complete one, is that edited by Edward Turner Bennett, secretary of the Zoological Society. n. 1720; p. 1793.

WHITE, Henry Kirke, an English poet, who was the son of a butcher, and was himself placed in the office of an attorney. By assiduous application, he taught himself Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese before he had attained his 19th year. In 1804 he put forth a small collection of poems; and in the same year was enabled to enter himself of the university of Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by his attainments, but was carried off by death almost at the onset of his brilliant career. His poems exhibit tenderness and a deep feeling for melody; but perhaps his reputation as a poet is mainly owing to the enthusiastic biography of him which was produced by Southey, who edited his "Remains." n. at Nottingham, 1785; p. at Cambridge, 1806.

WHITE, Rev. Joseph, an eloquent English divine, who was the son of a weaver in an obscure situation of life; but having, whilst a youth, exhibited a great aptitude for the acquisition of knowledge, he found a patron in a wealthy country gentleman, and was provided with the means of studying at Wadham College, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his attainments in the classical and oriental languages. In 1783 he was chosen to deliver the Hampton lectures, his subject being "A View of Christianity and Mohammedanism." These lectures exhibited great eloquence and erudition; and, upon being published, brought their author so high a reputation, as to gain for him a valuable prebend in the cathedral of Gloucester. But, unfortunately for his fame, it was afterwards discovered that he had received great assistance in the composition of his lectures from Dr. Parr and the Rev. Samuel Badoecok, without having had the honesty to avow his obligations to these divines. He subsequently received some lucrative preferments in the church. His most important works were, "A Specimen of the Civil and Military Institutes of Timour or Tamerlane, rendered from the Persian into English;" "On the Utility of the Arabic Tongue in Theological Studies;" "Chronological Arrangement of the Passages in the Greek Text of the Four Gospels containing the History of Christ;" an edition of the Greek New Testament; and a Latin translation of Abdallatif's "Description of Egypt." n. at Gloucester, about 1746; p. at Oxford, 1814.

WHITE, Rev. Joseph Blanco, a miscellaneous writer, who was descended from an Irish family settled in Spain, where it had been raised to noble rank. He himself was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood, and in 1799 entered into holy orders in Spain; but, repairing to England in 1810, he became a convert to Protestantism, passing thence to Unitarianism, and finally becoming a sceptic in matters of religious belief. In 1820 he entered upon a literary career, by contributing to the pages of the "New Monthly Magazine" a series of "Letters from Spain, by Don Leucadion Doblado." Subsequently he wrote several works, both in English and Spanish, the most popular of which were, "Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism," and "Poor Man's Preservative against Popery." He likewise contributed articles to the Quarterly, London, and Westminster Reviews, &c. His "Autobiography" was published after his death. b. at Seville, 1775; d. at Liverpool, 1841.

WHITEFIELD, George, white-field, one of the founders of Methodism, was the son of an innkeeper, and received his education in the grammar-school of St. Mary-de-Crypt at Gloucester, and afterwards became servitor in Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1736 he was ordained by Dr. Benson, bishop of Gloucester; after which his zeal prompted him to preach in prisons, private houses, the fields, and open streets. A course so strange and irregular gave offence to his ecclesiastical superiors, and the doors of the churches were everywhere shut against him. His eloquence was particularly fervid, and well adapted to make a great impression upon ordinary minds; in consequence of which he obtained many followers. In 1738 he went to Georgia, in America, whither he had been invited by John Wesley, where he was well received; and wonderful effects are recorded in his journals of the power of his preaching. Sudden and violent conversions were considered as indispensably necessary to prove that the hearers had obtained divine grace. For some time he acted in conjunction with the two Wesleys, but at last serious differences arose between them respecting the Calvinistic doctrines of absolute election and final perseverance. These were zealously maintained by Whitefield and his followers, and as strenuously denied by the others. A division arose, and the Methodists were divided into two great parties, called the Calvinistic and Arminian Methodists. He built two large conventicles in London, that called the Tabernacle, in the City, and another in Tottenham Court Road. He was also greatly assisted by Selina, countess of Huntingdon, who appointed him her chaplain, and became the patroness of the sect which he founded. His Sermons, Letters, and Controversial Tracts were published in London in 1771. b. in Gloucestershire, 1714; d. near Boston, U.S., 1770.

WHITEHEAD, George, white-head, a Quaker, who endured much persecution for his zealous attempts at proselytism; but continued to persevere, and, after the Revolution, procured for the members of his sect the legal allowance of making an affirmation instead of an oath. b. 1638; d. 1725.

WHITEHEAD, William, an English poet, who became secretary and registrar of the order of the Bath, and, in 1757, poet-laureate. Besides his odes and songs, he wrote "The Roman Father," and "Creusa," tragedies; "The School for Lovers," a comedy; "A Trip to Scotland," a farce. b. at Cambridge, 1715; d. 1788.

WHITEHEAD, Paul, an English poet, who was brought up to the business of a mercer, but afterwards studied the law. His friend Lord Despenser procured him a patent place, worth £800 a year. His poems are not above mediocrity. He was satirized by Churchill in these lines:—

"May I (can more disgrace on manhood fall?)

b. in London, 1710; d. 1774.

WHITELOCKE, Sir James, white-lock, a learned English lawyer, who in 1620 was elected member for Woodstock; and about the same time received the honour of knighthood, and the appointment of chief-justice of Chester. He afterwards became chief-justice of the King's Bench. His principal work was "Lectures; or, Readings in the Middle-Temple Hall." b. in London, 1570; d. 1632.

WHITLOCKE, Bulstrode, an eminent English statesman, the son of chief-justice Sir James Whitlocke, was educated at Merchant Taylors' school, and St. John's College, Oxford, whence he removed to the Middle Temple, where he studied the law under his father. In 1640 he represented Great Marlow, Buckinghamshire, in the Long Parliament, and was appointed chairman of the committee that prosecuted the earl of Strafford. Nominated one of the lay members in the Assembly of Divines, he, in 1647, became one of the commissioners of the great seal. In 1653 he was sent as ambassador from the Commonwealth to Sweden, and, on his return, was made a commissioner of the Treasury. In 1656 he was chosen speaker of the House of Commons, and, the year following, was called to the Upper House as one of Cromwell's lords. In 1659 he was appointed president of the council of state and keeper of the great seal, which he resigned soon after, and retired to Chilton, in Wiltshire. His principal works are, "Monarchy asserted to be the Best, most Ancient, and Legal Form of Government," "Memorials of English Affairs," and "Journal of the Swedish Embassy in 1653-54." b. in London, 1605; d. in Wiltshire, 1676.

WHITGIFT, John, whit-gift, an eminent English prelate, who received his education first at Queen's College, and afterwards removed to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. In 1600 he entered into orders, and became chaplain to Bishop Cox, of Ely. In 1563 he was appointed Lady Margaret's professor of divinity; in which position he acquired a high reputation for learning and eloquence. Even under the reign of Queen Mary he had been a zealous advocate for the principles of the Reformation, and after the accession of Elizabeth he became distinguished by his efforts to establish the new religious discipline in the university. Having preached before Elizabeth, she was so struck with his eloquence that she appointed him her chaplain. In 1567 she named him master of Trinity College and regius professor. He obtained the deanery of Lincoln in 1573, and in 1576 was consecrated bishop of Worcester; whence, in 1583, he was translated to Canterbury. He was a great favourite with his royal mistress, who used to call him her little black husband. He was a zealous governor of the church, and strenuously resisted the encroachments of the Puritans. The archbishop founded a hospital at Croydon. Although in affairs of ecclesiastical discipline, stern and inflexible to the last degree, his private acts were characterized by the utmost liberality. He was a constant patron of learning, and was esteemed as a gracious prelate by the most pious clergy of his time. B. at Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, 1530; D. in London, 1604.

WHITTINGHAM, William, whit'-ing-ham, an English divine, who, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, became dean of Durham; but, being strongly prejudiced against the Catholic religion, he committed great damage in removing the stone coffins and other ancient remains from the cathedral. He translated the Geneva Bible, and turned into metre some of the Psalms of David. They are in Stenhold and Hopkins' version, signed "W. W." B. at Chester, about 1509; D. 1579.

WHITTINGHAM, Sir Samuel Ford, a lieutenant-general in the British army, passed through the various gradations as a cavalry officer, and became deputy assistant quarter-master-general under the duke of Wellington in 1809. He afterwards served with the Portuguese army, and in America. The principal scene of his services, however, was with the Spanish troops during the Peninsular war, and he shared in the battles of Baylen, Barossa, and Talavera, in the last of which he was severely wounded. In 1812, having raised and disciplined a large corps of Spanish troops, he was appointed to the command as major-general; and, in conjunction with the British army at Alcantá, was successfully opposed to the French under Marshal Suchet; after which he served with distinction in command of a division of infantry, under Sir John Murray, and subsequently under Lord W. Bentinck. The prince regent appointed him one of his aides-de-camp, he received the honour of knighthood, and was invested with the grand cross of the order of San Fernando by the king of Spain, who, on Napoleon's escape from Elba, in 1815, sent expressly for him. In 1819 he was appointed governor of Dominica; in 1822 his services were transferred to India, as quarter-master-general of the king's troops, and subsequently as a major-general; in 1835, he was appointed to the command of the forces in the Windward and Leeward Islands, and in 1839 was nominated to the command in chief at Madras, where he arrived in 1840, but died 1841.

WHITTINGTON, Sir Richard, whit'-ing-ton, a wealthy citizen of London, who, according to Stow, flourished in the reigns of Richard II., Henry IV., and Henry V. He built Newgate, part of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, the library in Grey-Friars, now called Christ's Hospital, and part of Guildhall, with a chapel and depositary to keep the city records. He was knighted, and three times filled the office of lord-mayor of London, the last time being in 1419. D. 1423.

WHITTINGTON, Robert, a learned English grammarian, who was educated at Oxford. He published a Latin grammar in 1500, and several Latin pieces. He was a man whose learning and vanity were equally great, and was the last who received the title of poet-laureate from the university of Oxford. D. about 1530.

WHITWORTH, Charles, Lord, whit'-werth, an English diplomatist, who was appointed to represent Great Britain at the diet at Ratisbon; was twice sent to the court of Russia, on the last occasion for the special purpose of cooling the irritation of Peter the Great, who had become incensed at the arrest of his envoy for debt by some London tradesman. Lord Whitworth also acted as ambassador at the Hague and at Berlin, and as plenipotentiary at the congress of Cambray, in 1722. He wrote an interesting work, entitled "An Account of Russia," which was printed by Horace Walpole. B. in Staffordshire, about 1680; D. in London, 1725.

WHITWORTH, Charles, Earl, an English diplomatist, and relative of the preceding, became minister-plenipotentiary to Russia in 1788, holding the appointment during twelve years, and exercising considerable influence with Catherine II. After her death he induced Paul I. to enter into the coalition against France. In 1800 he went to the court of Denmark, and, in 1802, became ambassador to the government of France. In the following year, however, he quitted Paris, having received a marked rebuff at the hands of Bonaparte. When England was threatened with invasion by the French, he equipped a regiment of infantry at his own expense. In 1813 he was nominated lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and, in 1815, was created an earl. B. in Kent, 1754; D. 1825.

WHITWORTH, Joseph, an eminent English engineer, the inventor of the fire-arms and ordnance that bear his name. He has instituted a number of scholarships to induce artisans to acquire efficiency in art-knowledge connected with their callings. D. early in the present century.

WICKLIFFE. (See WICLIFFE.)

WICQUEFORT, Abraham, wik'-fort, a Dutch statesman and diplomatist, who entered the service of the elector of Brandenburg, and was employed as the agent of that prince in France, where he resided during thirty-two years, and gained the favour of Mazarin. But being accused of communicating secrets of importance to the Dutch government, he was confined in the Bastille. When the war broke out between France and Holland, he retired to the Hague, where he was imprisoned four years, on a charge of holding correspondence with the English. He contrived to make his escape, and retired to Zell. His principal works were, "A History of the United Provinces," and a Treatise on the Duties of an Ambassador." B. at Amsterdam, 1598; D. at Zell, 1682.

WIELAND, Christopher Martin, ve'-land, an eminent German poet and learned writer, who at an early age distinguished himself by his attainments in languages and in the composition of verse. He commenced in his 17th year the study of the law at the university of Tübingen; but, being resolved to devote himself to a literary career, went to Zurich, where, during two years (1752-4), he lived on terms of intimacy with Boelmer, the great German critic. In 1754 he received an appointment as private teacher; and, while thus engaged, composed two tragedies, a comedy, five cantos of an epic, and one of his most popular novels, entitled "Araspes and Panthea." During the interval 1760-66 he translated twenty-eight of the plays of Shakspeare into German. He next wrote his finest novel, "Agathon," and some poems, and in 1769 was appointed professor of philosophy in the university of Erfurt. In 1773 he went to reside at Weimar, where he had been engaged to superintend the education of the two sons of the Duchess Amalie. In this city he became acquainted with Göthe, who was indebted to Wieland for his introduction to the court of Weimar. Finally, he devoted himself to the illustration and translation of several of the Greek and Roman classics. He produced, among other works, a German edition of the Epistles and Satires of Horace, the Letters of Cicero, and a Commentary upon Lucian. He has been styled the "Voltaire of Germany," on account of the number, variety, and elegant style of his writings. His complete works, comprising plays, poems, criticisms, commentaries upon the classics, and philosophical miscellanies, have been published in 51 vols. B. near Biberach, Suabia, 1733; D. at Weimar, 1813.

WIFFEN, Jeremiah Holme, wy'-fen, an English poet and translator, who was a member of the Society of Friends, and for some years followed the profession of schoolmaster. His earliest efforts in literature were some poems contributed to the Rev. M. Parry's "History of Woburn," and a volume of verse, entitled "Aonian Hours." In 1819 he received the appointment of private secretary to the duke of Bedford. As a translator, he reproduced Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," and the poems of Garcilasso de la Vega. As an original writer, he published "Historical Memoirs of the House of Russell." B. near Woburn, 1792; D. 1856.

WILBERFORCE, William, wil'-ber-force, a distinguished English philanthropist, who was the son of a merchant of Hull, and exhibited from his earliest years great quickness and power of intellect. In his 14th year he is stated to have written a letter to a York newspaper, in which he denounced "the odious traffic in human flesh." In 1778 he entered St. John's College, Cambridge; but having become the possessor of a large fortune, after the demise of his uncle and grandfather, and having a strong predilection for social gatherings, he led a by no means studious life at the university: but his great natural ability enabled him to acquire a sound knowledge of the classics. Having formed the resolution to enter upon public life, he repaired to London, where he was admitted into the most fashionable society. Returned to Parliament as member for Hull, he joined the opposition to Lord North's ministry, and, in debate, condemned the American war. With Pitt, who had been his friend at Cambridge, he lived upon the most amicable terms; and when Pitt was nominated premier in 1783, Wilberforce, on several occasions, gave him very material assistance, but refused all offers of personal advancement. In his 28th year he resolved to devote himself to that cause which, even as a schoolboy, had been a subject of his thoughts,—the abolition of negro slavery. During twenty years he continued to solicit the emancipation of the negro, by speeches in Parliament; by seeking the co-operation of the clergy of every denomination; by his own pen and purse, and those of his friends; by negotiating with foreign powers, and by conciliating the support of every public man or minister in his native country. Continually being disappointed, he was ever ready to proceed with new vigour, until, after pursuing his philanthropic labours with a persistency and energy truly marvellous, he saw the hour of his success at hand. In 1807 the abolition bill passed the Lords, and its after progress through the Commons was one uninterrupted ovation to its projector. Sir Samuel Romilly, after an eloquent speech in favour of the bill, concluded by "contrasting the feelings of Napoleon in all his greatness with those of that honoured individual who would this day lay his head upon his pillow, and remember that the slave-trade was no more." Of a deeply religious nature, he, in 1797, produced a work which met with a remarkable success, entitled "Practical View of the prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes of this Country contrasted with Real Christianity." He likewise aided all the benevolent and religious societies of his time, assisted in the foundation of the English churches in India, and expended more than a fourth of his income in private charity. Shortly before his death he said, "Thank God! that I should have lived to witness a day in which England is willing to give twenty millions sterling for the abolition of slavery." His remains, which were interred in Westminster Abbey, were honoured with a public funeral. B. at Hull, 1759; D. in London, 1833.

WILBERFORCE, Samuel, a modern English prelate, and son of the preceding, received his education at Oriel College, Oxford, to which university he in 1837 was nominated select preacher. Two years later he became archdeacon of Surrey and chaplain to Prince Albert. In 1840 he was preferred to a canonry of Winchester Cathedral; in 1844 became sub-almoner to the queen; and in 1845 dean of Westminster. In the same year he was made B.D. and D.D. of the university of Oxford, and was also nominated bishop of that diocese, the office of chancellor of the order of the Garter accompanying the dignity. In 1847 he became lord high almoner to her Majesty. In addition to sermons, charges

WILBROD, or WILLIBROD, St., wil'-brod, "the apostle of the Frisians," was a monk of Wilfred's monastery, at Ripon, and about 677 proceeded to Ireland to preach Christianity. In 690 he went to Utrecht, and having, after great exertions, converted large numbers of the Frisians to Christianity, he was rewarded with the bishopric of Utrecht by Pope Sergius I. He also preached to the Danes, and established the monastery of Epternach, near Trèves. B. in Northumbria, about 657; D. at Trèves, 738.

WILBYE, John, wil'-be, an eminent English musical composer, who produced some of the most excellent madrigals to be found in the whole range of the English school of music. Beyond the fact that in 1593 he taught music at Austin-friars, nothing is known of his life. Some of his works have been reprinted by the Society of Musical Antiquaries. Among his best productions may be quoted, "Flora gave me Fairest Flowers," "Sweet honey-sucking Bees," "Down in a Valley," "Fair as Morn," and "Fly, Love, to Heaven." Lived between 1550 and 1625.

WILD, Henry, wilds, called the "Arabian Tailor," by his own unaided exertions made himself master of the Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Chaldaic, Latin, Syrian, and Persian languages. He was drawn from obscurity by Dr. Prideaux, who procured him a place in the Bodleian library. Afterwards removing to London, he was supported by Dr. Mead. He translated from the Arabic, "Mohammed's Journey to Heaven." B. at Norwich, about 1634; D. 1733.

WILDE, James Plaisted, Lord Penzance, a brother of the first Lord Truro, was called to the bar in 1839, and after a successful career as a barrister, was knighted and made a baron of the Exchequer in 1860. On Sir Creswell Creswell's death in 1863, he was made judge of the court of Probate and Divorce, and, in 1869, called to the House of Lords as Lord Penzance. b. 1816.

WILKES, John, an eminent English politician, who was the son of a rich distiller in London. After receiving a liberal education, he travelled abroad, married a lady of fortune, and became colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia. In 1757 he was elected to Parliament for Aylesbury, and at this time became a violent opponent of the Bute administration, by publishing a periodical paper called the "North Briton," in the forty-fifth number of which he declared the king to have uttered a falsehood in his speech from the throne; whereupon a warrant was issued by the earl of Halifax, secretary of state, to seize Wilkes's person and papers. This affair made much noise, and brought him into great repute as the patriot of the day. After obtaining his release from the Tower, he entered an action against the earl of Halifax, and obtained a verdict by which general warrants were declared illegal. He was, however, soon afterwards expelled the House of Commons, for having published an obscene publication, called an "Essay on Woman." He was at different times returned for Middlesex; but the election was always declared void, till 1774, when he was permitted to take his seat without further opposition. The same year he served the office of lord mayor. He afterwards obtained the lucrative office of chamberlain of the city of London, and in 1790 quitted Parliament. He rendered eminent service in the riots of 1780, by exerting himself with such promptitude as to save the Bank from the depredators. b. in London, 1727; d. 1797.

WILKIE, Sir David, wil'-ke, a celebrated Scotch painter, who so early evinced his predilection for pictorial art, that he could draw before he could spell. In his 14th year he became a pupil at the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, where, says Sir William Allan, one of his fellow-students, "his advancement was marvellous, and he soon took up that position in art which he maintained to the last. He was always on the look-out for character; he frequented trysts, fairs, and market-places." About his 20th year he repaired to London, where, in 1806, he painted and exhibited his "Village Politicians," which was purchased by the earl of Mansfield for 30 guineas. The great success of this work, which was executed in a style quite unusual with the artists of that period, quickly brought Wilkie into notice, and he found patrons in abundance. Among other fine works which he painted about this time were, "The Rent Day," "The Cat Finger," and "The Village Festival." In 1809 he became associate, and in 1811 member of the Royal Academy. In 1814 he went to Paris, in order to study the works of art which Napoleon had brought together during his occupation of different continental cities. Up to the year 1822 he continued to produce masterpieces of art in the style in which "The Village Politicians" had been painted. At this latter date he executed his finest work, "The Chelsea Pensioners," which was commissioned of him by the Duke of Wellington for 1200 guineas. After this picture, he changed his style, and adopted one in which he was less successful. He changed his subjects also, and now painted

"Portrait of the king in a Scotch Dress." Having suffered in his health, he spent three years upon the continent, and after his return to England, was in 1830 nominated painter to the king. For the presidentship of the Royal Academy he likewise became a candidate; but obtained only one vote. In 1836 he received the honour of knighthood from William IV. Meanwhile he had produced a number of excellent works, for which he received the the reformation in St. Andrews," "Mary Queen of Scots Escaping from Lochleven," and "The Cottar's Saturday Night." In 1848 he set out upon a tour to the East, and, after visiting Constantinople, Beyrout, Jerusalem, and Alexandria, embarked at the latter place for England. He had felt unwell for some months previously, and, by the time that the ship had reached Gibraltar, the great painter was no more. His remains were committed to the sea upon the evening of the day on which his death took place. A statue in his honour is set up in the National Gallery. b. at Cuts, Fifeshire, 1785; d. at sea, off Gibraltar, 1841.

WILKINS, John, wil'-kins, a learned English prelate, who after entering into orders, became chaplain to Lord Say, and afterwards to Charles, count-palatine of the Rhine. In 1688 he published his "Discovery of a New World," or an attempt to prove that the moon may be another habitable world. This idea he enlarged and supported in a discourse concerning a new planet in 1640. In 1640 he became warden of Wadham College, Oxford; and, about 1656, married Mrs. Robina French, a sister of Oliver Cromwell. In 1659 he was made master of Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was deprived at the Restoration. He then became preacher at Gray's Inn, and rector of St. Lawrence-Jewry. He was one of the founders of the Royal Society, and in 1684, was promoted to the see of Chester. Besides his mathematical works, he was also the author of some sermons, and a discourse on the "Gift of Preaching." b. near Daventry, Northampton, 1614; d. 1672.

WILKINS, David, a learned English antiquary and divine, who became keeper of the library at Lambeth, of which he drew up a catalogue. Archbishop Wake bestowed upon him some church preferment. He published the New Testament in Coptic, an edition of the Saxon laws, and another of Selden's works. - 1683; d. 1745.

WILKINS, Sir Charles, an eminent English oriental scholar, who, in 1770, went to Calcutta as a writer in the service of the East India Company, and in a short time distinguished himself by his attainments in Arabic and Persian. In 1788 he printed an edition of the Bengalee Grammar of Halhed, the type for which he engraved and founded himself. In this undertaking his untaught skill had triumphed over obstacles which had hitherto been found insuperable by the ablest typesetters in England. He subsequently acquired the Sanscrit language, translated the "Bhagvatgita," the Sanscrit original of the fables of Pilpay, and wrote a Sanscrit grammar. In 1801 he became librarian to the East India Company, was knighted in 1833, and for many years previous to his death held the post of examiner in oriental literature of the students at Addiscombe and Haileybury. His attainments won for him the title of "Father of Sanscrit literature." b. at Frome, Somersetshire, 1749; d. 1836.

WILKINS, William, an English architect, who after concluding his educational career at the university of Cambridge, repaired to Italy and Greece, an account of the antiquities of which countries he produced in 1807. Upon commencing the practice of his profession, he was employed as the architect of Downing College. He subsequently designed the East India College at Haileybury; the alterations at Trinity, Corpus, and King's Colleges, Cambridge; the University College, Gower Street, London; the University Club, Pall Mall; St. George's Hospital, London; the Nelson Pillar, Dublin; and the National Gallery. He produced, among other works, "Remarks on the Buildings and Antiquities of Athens," and an edition of the "Civil architecture" of Vitruvius. b. at Norwich, 1778; d. at Cambridge, 1839.

WILKINSON, Sir John Gardner, wil'-kin-son, a learned English writer, who spent many years in Egypt, in the study of the antiquities of that country. He produced, among other works, which were distinguished by their accurate learning and excellent style, "Topography of Thebes and General View of Egypt," "The Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians," "Handbook for Travellers in Egypt," "Modern Egypt and Thebes," and the "Architecture of Ancient Egypt." His merits as an archaeologist were rewarded with the honour of knighthood in 1840. b. 1797.

WILLAN, Robert, wil'-lan, an eminent English physician, who studied medicine at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1782 repaired to London, where he soon acquired a practice, and was appointed physician to the Finsbury Dispensary. To the treatment of diseases of the skin he devoted great attention, and published thereupon several very valuable works. He was likewise the author of "Reports on the Diseases of London," and several papers upon antiquarian subjects, communicated to the Antiquarian Society, of which, as well as of the Royal Society, he was a member. b. near Sedburgh, Yorkshire, 1757; d. at Madeira, 1812.

WILLEMS, Jan Frans, vill'-ems, an eminent Flemish writer, and the founder of the "Flemish movement" for reviving the study of Dutch literature throughout Belgium. In 1818 he wrote a stirring lyric, in which he exhorted his countrymen not to neglect the language of their fathers, and throughout his life endeavoured to revive the Dutch tongue, which had been almost wholly abandoned for the French. In this he was opposed by Van de Weyer and others; but he lived to see his favourite Flemish language become popular with poets and historical writers as a vehicle for the expression of their thoughts. He was the author of thirty-four works in Flemish and five in French. b. at Bouchout, near Antwerp, 1793; d. at Ghent, 1846.

WILLIAM I., wil'-yam, king of England, commonly called the Conqueror, was the natural son of Robert I., duke of Normandy, surnamed "the Devil." He became duke of Normandy at the death of his father in 1035, and reigned quietly till the death of Edward the Confessor; when, pretending that the crown of England had been bequeathed to him by that monarch, he fitted out a large expedition, and landed on the coast of Sussex. As soon as the troops were disembarked, he burnt the vessels, exclaiming, "See your country." Harold led an army against him, but was defeated and slain at Hastings, in 1066; after which William marched to London, and was crowned at Westminster on Christmas-day. He reigned with great tyranny; in consequence of which several insurrections took place, and were not quelled until the conqueror had depopulated different districts by fire and sword. He then divided the lands of most of the nobility and gentry among his followers. He also introduced the Norman language, and ordered that all law-pleadings and statutes should be in that tongue. To prevent nightly meetings and conspiracies, he instituted the curfew, or "ever-fire bell," at the sound of which, every night at eight o'clock, all fires and candles were to be put out. A survey was made of all the lands in the kingdom, the account or register of which was called the Domesday Book. In 1078 he finished the Tower of London; in 1087 he attacked and destroyed the city of Mantes. He was about to march towards Paris; but died in consequence of an injury he received. b. 1027; d. at Rouen, 1087.

WILLIAM II., usually called Rufus, was the son of the Conqueror, and crowned on the news of his father's death reaching England in 1087. He made a conquest of part of Wales, and obtained the duchy of Normandy from his brother Robert in 1096. He was a great persecutor of the clergy, and banished Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, from the kingdom. William was, according to the monkish chronicles, accidentally slain by an arrow, shot by Sir Walter Tyrrell, as he was hunting in the New Forest, Hampshire. b. in Normandy, 1066; killed 1100.

WILLIAM III., prince of Orange-Nassau and king of England, was the son of William, prince of Orange, and Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I. He married the Princess Mary, daughter of James II., duke of York, and succeeded to the stadtholdership in 1672. He was also nominated general of the troops of Holland against Louis XIV., and made a vigorous resistance to the French armies under Luxembourg, whom he defeated in 1674, but was repulsed in his turn by the Prince de Condé. In 1688 the arbitrary measures, both against the established religion and the constitution, of James II., induced many nobles and others to invite the prince of Orange to take possession of the English crown. He embraced the occasion, and landed without opposition at Torbay the same year. James, finding himself unsupported, withdrew to France, and William took possession of his throne, in conjunction with his wife, the daughter of that unfortunate monarch. His coronation as king of England took place in 1689. The year following, William went to Ireland, where he defeated James at the battle of the Boyne. In 1691 he headed the confederated army in the Netherlands, took Namur in 1695, and in 1697 was acknowledged king of England by the treaty of Ryswick. On the death of Mary in 1693, the Parliament confirmed to him the royal title. His death was owing to a fall from his horse, by which he broke his collar-bone. b. at the Hague, 1650; d. at Kensington, 1702. The great aim of William's policy was to curb the ambition and power of Louis XIV. of France, with which object he spent nearly his whole life in warfare, and though almost always defeated, in spite of great military skill, was never really beaten, as he had a singular power of rapidly and effectually repairing disasters. The war begun by him was more successfully carried on, during the reign of his successor, by the two great military chiefs of their time, Marlborough and Prince Eugene.

WILLIAM IV., king of England, was the third son of George III. In his 15th year he entered the royal navy, and in 1780 was with Admiral Rodney when the latter defeated a Spanish squadron off Cadiz, and afterwards proceeded to the relief of Gibraltar. Prince William subsequently held the command of a vessel of war in various parts of the world, but retired from active service in 1790. Upon the death of his brother, George IV., in 1830, he became king of England, and ruled until 1837. At his death, the Princess Victoria, daughter of his brother, the duke of Kent, became queen of England. b. in London, 1765; d. at Windsor, 1837.

WILLIAM (Frederick) I., king of the Netherlands, was the son of William V., prince of Orange-Nassau, a descendant of the famous William I. of Orange. Whilst hereditary prince, he acted as commander-in-chief of the Dutch army in defence of his country against the French; but on being defeated by the revolutionary armies, took up his residence at Berlin. He next served with the Prussian forces against Napoleon I., and after the battle of Jena, was declared by the emperor to have forfeited his territories. He subsequently commanded a Prussian corps at Wagram and at Leipzig; after which victory an insurrection burst forth in Holland, and William Frederick was declared the sovereign prince of Holland. He gave a constitution to his subjects, and armed them against the French. By the congress of Vienna he was proclaimed king of the Netherlands, his kingdom including Belgium, Liege, and the Seven United Provinces. In the year following the battle of Waterloo he joined the holy alliance, and sent a squadron to Algiers to co-operate with the English under Lord Exmouth. Despite his conciliatory policy, he could not succeed in fusing the Dutch and Belgians into a single united nation. Accordingly, in 1830, the Belgians rose in insurrection; the result of which was, that the northern and southern provinces became separated, Belgium being erected, by a treaty of the five powers of Russia, Prussia, Austria, England, and France, into an independent monarchy. William and his subjects prepared to resist this decision of the five powers. A Dutch army of 70,000 men entered Belgium and took Turnhout and other places; but England sent a fleet to the coast, while the French laid siege to, and took Antwerp in 1832. Holland was thus compelled, most unwillingly, to recognize Belgium as a separate power. In 1840, in consequence of the wide-spread discontent evinced towards his rule, he abdicated the crown of the Netherlands in favour of his son. He retired to Berlin, where he married the countess D'Oultremont. b. at the Hague, 1772; d. at Berlin, 1843.

WILLIAM II., king of the Netherlands, was son of the preceding, who caused him to be carefully educated for the profession of arms in the military academy at Berlin. He afterwards accompanied the English army to Spain, became aide-de-camp to the duke of Wellington, and distinguished himself by his bravery at the sieges of Ciudad-Rodrigo and Badajoz, as also at the battle of Salamanca. In 1815 he took the command of the army of the Netherlands, and fought with conspicuous bravery at the battles of Quatre Bras and Waterloo; in which latter he was, while leading his men to the charge, wounded in the shoulder. At the congress at Paris, it was proposed that he should become the husband of the Princess Charlotte of England; but the project failed. At the outburst of the revolution of 1830 he proceeded to Brussels, with the view of effecting a reconciliation between the northern and southern states. On subsequently acceding, however, to the independence of Belgium, his father, William I., became so incensed at the act, that he caused the prince to be cashiered. Prince William thereupon retired to England, whence he was recalled to assume the command of the Dutch army. In 1840, upon the abdication of his father, he became king of the Netherlands. b. 1792; d. 1849.

WILLIAM III., king of the Netherlands, son of the preceding, succeeded to the throne at a period when, the revolutionary storm of 1848 having just burst over the continent, his subjects, who indeed had been somewhat unjustly governed during the latter years of the preceding reign, demanded considerable concessions. At this juncture he exhibited both sagacity and promptness of decision; and, by his liberal but firm measures, succeeded in preserving his crown. b. 1817.

WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM. (See William of.)

WILLIAMS, John, cril'-yams, a celebrated English prelate. In 1612 he became chaplain to Lord Chancellor Egerton, by whose means he obtained some considerable preferment, and was admitted into his lordship's entire confidence. He afterwards became chaplain to the king, and in 1620 dean of Westminster. Having instigated the duke of Buckingham to save himself by sacrificing Lord Bacon, the favourite, in gratitude, caused the astute ecclesiastic to be appointed keeper of the great seal and bishop of Lincoln. He attended James I. on his death-bed, and preached his funeral sermon, in which he compared him to Solomon. But soon after the accession of Charles I., the great seal was taken from him, and he was prosecuted in the Star Chamber, on a charge of betraying the king's secrets, fined £10,000, and imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained for upwards of three years. In 1640 he was released by Parliament, and, the year following, made archbishop of York. At the outbreak of the civil war he retired to Wales, and garrisoned Conway Castle in the royal cause. b. 1522; d. 1650.

WILLIAMS, Roger, an English divine, who, embracing the Puritan doctrines, left the established church, and in 1831 emigrated to America, where he became distinguished for his religious real. He also wrote an eloquent work in favour of liberty of conscience. Having defied the authorities in Massachusetts, he, to escape the consequences, fled to the woods, where he found an asylum among the Indians. In 1836 he, with some of his followers, landed at Rhode Island, purchased some land of the Indians, and founded a colony, which he called Providence, because, he said, "I desired it might be a shelter for persons distressed for conscience." He subsequently held the presidency of this colony. He produced a large number of eloquent works, in which he defended the right of every one to worship God in his own way. Bancroft, in his "History of America," says of Roger Williams that "he was the first person in modern Christendom to assert, in its plenitude, entire liberty of conscience." B. 1599; D. at Providence, Rhode Island, 1633.

WILLIAMS, John, a pious English bishop, who, in 1689, became chaplain to William and Mary, was appointed prebend of Canterbury, and in 1696 promoted to the bishopric of Chichester. He published several tracts against the Roman Catholics and dissenters, and a volume of sermons, preached at Boyle's lecture. B. in Northamptonshire, about 1640; D. 1709.

WILLIAMS, Daniel, an eminent Presbyterian minister. He officiated some time in Dublin; whence he repaired to London in 1697; and became pastor of a congregation. In 1709 he obtained his doctor's degree from Glasgow and Dublin. He founded the library in Redcross Street for dissenting ministers, and left his large property to various charities. He wrote a number of learned discourses. B. at Wrexham, Denbighshire, 1644; D. in London, 1716.

WILLIAMS, Sir Charles Hanbury, an English poet and statesman, represented the county of Monmouth in three successive Parliaments, and in 1744 was installed knight of the Bath. Two years afterwards he was sent as ambassador to Prussia, and subsequently in the same capacity to Russia, whence he returned in 1759. His poems are remarkably spirited. B. 1709; D. 1759.

WILLIAMS, Anna, a poet and miscellaneous writer, and friend of Dr. Johnson, who, having lost her sight by a cataract, was received under the hospitable roof of the great lexicographer, where she died. B. 1706; D. 1783.

WILLIAMS, David, a miscellaneous writer, a dissenting minister, and delictual lecturer, in which last capacity he was unsuccessful, and had recourse to private teaching and literary labour. He was the founder of the Literary Fund Society, and at the close of his life was himself a recipient of its bounty. His principal works are, "Lectures on Education," "Lectures on Political Principles," a "History of Monmouthshire," and "Lectures on the Principles and Duties of Religion and Morality." B. in Cardiganshire, 1735; D. 1816.

WILLIAMS, Helen Maria, a writer on history, politics, and general literature, settled at Paris in 1790; and soon after appeared her "Letters from France," the object of which was to recommend the doctrines of the Girondists; and consequently on their fall she was arrested, imprisoned, and nearly shared their fate. Besides poems and minor works, she produced an English translation of the "Personal Narrative of the Travels of Humboldt and Bonpland in America," and wrote a "Narrative of Events in France in 1815." &c. B. 1762; D. 1827.

WILLIAMS, Rev. John, an English dissenting divine, who became celebrated as the Apostle of Polynesia. He was apprenticed to the business of an ironmonger; but having resolved to devote himself to missionary labours, he was, in 1816, dispatched to the islands in the Pacific, where he remained until 1824, preaching Christianity to, and civilizing, the natives of Polynesia. After his return to England, in the last-named year, he produced a "Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South-Sea Islands, with Remarks upon the Natural History of the Islands, and the Origin, Languages, Traditions, and Usages of the Inhabitants." This work attracted great attention, and a subscription was commenced for the purpose of fitting out an expedition, at the head of which Williams was to be placed. In 1838 he sailed from England in a well-equipped vessel, and, after visiting Tahiti, Raietouga, Raiatea, and other of the Society Islands, proceeded westward to the Island of Erromango, where he was murdered by the natives. B. at Tottenham, 1796; killed, 1839.

WILLIAMS, Sir William Fenwick, K.C.B., an English general, who bravely defended the Turkish fortress of Kars against the Russians, was educated for the artillery service at Woolwich, and in 1825 received his first commission as second lieutenant. After serving in Ceylon, he was, in 1843, nominated commissioner for settling the Turkish and Persian frontiers; a task upon which he was engaged until the year 1852. In the meanwhile he had acted as instructor to the Turks in artillery, as a member of the conference of Erzeroum, and had been appointed lieutenant-colonel. At the outbreak of the Russian war he was sent, with the rank of brigadier-general, as British commissioner with the Turkish forces in the East. Assisted by Colonel Lake and General Kmety, he fortified the city of Kars, where, in 1855, he defeated the Russians; but, not receiving any reinforcements, he was compelled to capitulate, after a terrible siege, in which the extremes of hunger and fatigue were endured by the garrison. He was sent, with Colonel Lake, to St. Petersburg, as prisoners of war, but returned to England after the signature of the treaty of peace in 1856. For his distinguished services he was created a baronet, granted a pension of £1000 per annum, and presented with the freedom of the city of London. He was likewise nominated commander of the Woolwich garrison, and was returned to Parliament for Calne, but resigned his seat in 1859, in which year he was appointed to the command of the troops in Canada. B. at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1800.

WILLIAMSON, Sir Joseph, will-yam-son, an English statesman, who received his education in the university of Oxford, and subsequently to the Restoration, became keeper of the state-paper office, clerk of the council, a knight, and English plenipotentiary at the treaty of Cologne. In 1674 he succeeded Lord Arlington as secretary of state, which office he resigned after being committed to the Tower, among other victims of the Popish plot. In 1678 he was elected president of the Royal Society. At his death he bequeathed £6000 and some valuable manuscripts to the university of Oxford, as well as £5000 to found a mathematical seminary at Rochester. B. about 1623; D. 1701.

WILLIAMSON, Hugh, an American physician, received his education at the college of Philadelphia; but relinquishing the clerical profession, for which he had been intended, turned his attention first to mathematics, and subsequently to medicine. After visiting Edinburgh and Leyden, at the university of which latter city he obtained the degree of M.D., he returned and practised in Philadelphia. He was one of the committee appointed by the American Philosophical Society, in 1769, to observe the transit of Venus over the solar disc; and attracted considerable attention by his observations on the comet which then made its appearance, as he contended that comets, instead of being gaseous masses, are inhabited planets. He served on the medical staff of the revolutionary army; and at the restoration of peace became a member of Congress. Among his works are, "The History of North Carolina," and "Observations on the Climate of America." B. 1735 D. 1819.

WILLIS, Thomas, will'-is, an eminent physician, who was educated at Christchurch, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1642 he took up arms in the service of the king; but, after the surrender of the garrison, applied himself to the study of physic. In 1660 he was appointed Sedleian professor of natural philosophy, and in the same year received his doctor's degree. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society, and became fellow of the College of Physicians. The most celebrated physician of his time, he wrote upon medical and philosophical subjects. B. at Great Bedwin, Wilts, 1631; D. in London, 1675.

WILLIS, Browne, an English antiquary, and son of the preceding, was educated at Westminster school, whence he was elected to Christchurch, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of doctor of laws. He was one of the revivers of the Society of Antiquaries, and during his long life visited all the cathedrals in England and Wales, except Carlisle. He was at one time member of Parliament for Buckingham. He gave his cabinet of coins and manuscripts to the university of Oxford. He published a "Survey of the Cathedrals of England;" also an "Account of the Mitred Abbays," &c. B. at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1632; D. 1700.

WILLIS, Nathaniel Park, a modern American littérateur, who commenced the practice of his profession in his 20th year. After editing several American periodicals, he became secretary of legation at Paris; after which he travelled in France, Italy, Greece, and Turkey. An account of these wanderings was given to the public in a volume entitled "Pencilings by the Way." The great success of this work encouraged him to produce a number of similar light sketchy books, the most popular of which were, "Inklings of Adventure," "Loiterings of Travel," and "Letters from under a Bridge." After editing the "New York Mirror" and "Home Journal," he, in 1852, made a trip to the West Indies, publishing his travelling impressions in a work called "A Health Trip to the Tropics." In addition to the works mentioned, he wrote a great number of others; such as "Hurry-graphs, or Sketches of Scenery, Celebrities, and Society;" "Dashes at Life with a free Pencil;" and "People I have met." B. at Portland, Maine, U.S., 1817; D. 1867.

WILLIS, Rev. Robert, an eminent natural philosopher, who became Jacksonian professor in the university of Cambridge in 1837. Devoting himself to the study and elucidation of the philosophical principles of mechanism, acoustics, and ancient architecture, he produced upon those subjects a number of highly valuable works, memoirs, and lectures. The most important of these publications were, "On the Construction of the Vaults of the Middle Ages;" "An Architectural History of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre;" "Principles of Mechanism;" and some articles upon acoustics in the "Transactions" of the Cambridge Philosophical Society. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. B. in London, 1800.

WILLOUGHBY, Sir Hugh, will'-lo-be, an English navigator, who, in 1663, sailed in command of three vessels upon a voyage of discovery in the North Sea; but all the ships were lost, and only a few of the seamen returned to England. To one of the captains engaged in this expedition we owe the earliest account in the English language of Russia. Sir Hugh lived in the 16th century.

WILLOUGHBY, Francis, an eminent English naturalist, who, while a student at the university of Cambridge, formed a close friendship with Mr. Ray, whom he accompanied in several excursions over England and Scotland, also through France, Holland, Germany, Italy, and Switzerland. B. at Wotton, Essex, 1659; D. 1733.

WILMOT, John (See ROCHESTER, Earl of.)

WILSON, Florence, will'-son, a Scotch writer, who went to Bâle, and lastly to Paris, where he taught philosophy in the college of Navarre. He wrote a treatise, in Latin, on "Tranquillity of Mind," and other works. Supposed to have been born in Moray, 1500; D. in Scotland, 1545.

WILSON, Dr. Thomas, an English statesman and learned writer, who, after receiving his education at Eton and Cambridge, became tutor to the sons of the Duke of Suffolk. In 1551 he put forth the "Rule of Reason, containing the Art of Logic;" and two years later, "The Art of Rhetoric." At the accession of Mary he went abroad; but was arrested by the Inquisition at Rome, where he was confined till 1555; at which time the prison was broken open during a riot, and Wilson escaped with others. When Elizabeth became queen, he returned to his native country, and was named master of St. Catherine's Hospital, and subsequently private secretary to her majesty. In 1576 he was sent to the Low Countries as the envoy of England, and in the following year was nominated secretary of state. Before his death he was made dean of Durham, B. in Lincolnshire, about 1520; D. 1581.

WILSON, Richard, an eminent painter, received an excellent education under his father, who was rector of Pincras, in Montgomeryshire, and having evinced a strong inclination for painting, he was placed under an obscure artist in London. Subsequently he followed portrait-painting in London with success. In 1749 he went to Italy, where an English gentleman employed him in taking sketches and painting landscapes. At Rome he cultivated the friendship of Vernet, the celebrated French painter, who advised him to follow landscape-painting. In 1755 he returned to England, where he acquired the highest reputation. On the establishment of the Royal Academy, he became a member, and in 1779 librarian. Wilson has been styled the English Claude. B. at Pincras, 713; D. in Denbighshire, 1782.

WILSON, Alexander, an eminent Scotch naturalist, who was at first a weaver and pedlar; ascribed by a few critics to Burns, made little impression. In 1794 he emigrated to the United States, where he worked successively as a copper-plate printer, pedlar, land-measurer, and schoolmaster. In 1802 he became acquainted with a naturalist named Bartram, and afterwards with an engraver, making, under the tuition of the latter, great progress as a draughtsman of birds. In 1804 he went forth upon an expedition to the Falls of Niagara; and from his period until the time of his death, his life was spent in wanderings over the United States, killing and collecting the finest specimens of American ornithology. Descriptions of the birds, and beautiful drawings after his own designs, were subsequently published. The work which has made his name famous as a naturalist, is his "American Ornithology," the first volume of which appeared in 1808. He had almost completed the eighth volume of this fine work when he was attacked by dysentery, which carried him off. b. at Paisley, Scotland, 1766; d. at Philadelphia, U.S., 1813.

WILSON, William Rae, LL.D., chiefly known by his "Travels in the Holy Land," was one of the first of a class of travellers, since become numerous, whose object has been to illustrate the statements of Holy writ by observations on the scenery and manners of those parts of the world in which its events transpired. b. 1774; d. 1849.

WILSON, Sir Robert Thomas, an English general, who, having risen to the rank of brigadier by his distinguished conduct in different parts of the world, was appointed to the command of a Spanish corps which served under Wellington. In 1812-14 he acted as British commissioner with the allied armies. After the death of Queen Caroline, he expressed his disapprobation of the measures pursued by the government towards that lady; for which he was deprived of his rank, and also of the orders he had earned by his bravery. He was an active supporter of the Liberal party in Parliament between the years 1818-31, and in 1841 was reinstated in his rank and honours; and in the interval 1842-49, held the governorship of Gibraltar. He produced a translation of Regnier's "Campaign in 1801 in the East and Egypt," and afterwards wrote "Historical Account of the British Expedition to Egypt," "An Enquiry into the Military Force of the British Empire," and "Sketch of the Military Power of Russia." b. in London, 1777; d. 1849.

WILSON, Professor John, an eminent Scotch poet and essayist, who received his education at the University of Oxford, where he was distinguished by his literary attainments, no less than for his skill in every athletic exercise. After taking his degrees in arts, he quitted the university. "A fair-haired Hercules-Apollo," writes one of his biographers, "and with plenty of money, enabling him to gratify his tastes, whatever they might be, he had scarcely left Oxford when he signalized his double character, by purchasing, or having purchased for him by his father, the small but beautiful estate of Ellery, on Lake Windermere, where, as Hercules, he might yacht about at his pleasure, beat the best boatman at the oar, and wrestle or box with the strongest daleman; and, as Apollo, he might revel in the quiet beauties of the finest of English scenery, indulge undisturbed in poetic visions of his own, and cultivate, with due reverence, the society of Wordsworth." He always spent some portion of the year in Edinburgh, and there made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, who spoke of him, in a letter, as "an eccentric genius." After putting forth some minor lyrical attempts, he, in 1812, published "The Isle of Palms," which was well received, and enabled its author to take a position among the "Lake" poets, with whom he was living upon terms of friendship. His prepossessions, both political and literary, led him to attach himself to the little band of young Tories, with Scott at their head, who caused "Blackwood's Magazine" to be started as an outlet for Scottish Toryism, as British Toryism was generally represented by the "Quarterly Review." In 1818 Wilson produced "The City of the Plague;" in 1820 he was nominated to the chair of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. He next published "Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life," and the "Trials of Margaret Lyndsay;" political articles, and literary criticisms. In 1825 he began his celebrated "Noctes Ambrosianae," under the name of "Christopher North." One of his biographers thus speaks of Wilson as the author of these famous sketches:—"Careless of the formality conventionally identified with the gown of a Scotch professor of moral philosophy, he wrote papers for the magazine, in which he was seen relapsing ideally into his character as an untrammelled human being, a bruiser at country fairs, a boon companion among bacchanalians, commenting on men and manners from the point of view of an inspired king of the gipsies." In the interval 1836-46 he wrote, as a pendant to the "Noctes," his "Dies Boreales;" but these met with less success. In 1855 a collected edition of his works was commenced. b. at Paisley, 1785; d. at Edinburgh, 1854.

WILSON, James, a modern Scotch politician and writer upon political economy, who was at first in business as a hatter; but, having failed, turned his attention to literary pursuits. In 1839 he produced a treatise upon the "Influence of the Corn Laws," a work which attracted great notice, and in 1843 he became principal editor of the "Economist." He was elected a member of the House of Commons in 1847, in the following year was appointed secretary to the Board of Control, and in 1852 financial secretary to the Treasury. In 1859, Mr. Wilson went out to India to inaugurate certain reforms in the financial government of that country. b. at Hawick, Roxburghshire, 1805; d. in India, 1860.

WINKELMAN, John Joachim, vin'-kel-man, a celebrated German antiquary, who was brought up to the trade of a shoemaker, which occupation he quitted for the study of literature at Seehausen, where he became a professor of the belles-lettres. In 1754 he went to Dresden, and embraced the Roman Catholic religion. The year following he visited Rome, where, in 1762, he was appointed president of antiquities. He was considered as the first connoisseur of his time, and his friendship was courted by all persons who travelled to Rome to observe the antiquities and curiosities of that city and neighbourhood. He was assassinated at Trieste by a villain to whom he had shown some of his valuable medals, and who attempted to steal one. The murderer was taken and executed. Winkelman wrote, "The History of the Arts among the Ancients;" "Elucidation of difficult Points of Mythology;" "Allegory for Artists;" "Remarks upon Ancient Architecture." After his death were published his "Familiar Letters." b. in Brandenburg, 1717; killed, 1768.

WINDHAM, William, wind'-ham, an eminent English politician and parliamentary orator, who became a member of the celebrated Literary Club, where he acquired the friendship of Johnson and Burke; and, after acting as chief secretary to Lord Northampton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, entered Parliament, in 1784, as member for Norwich. After making his first speech,

Mr. Fox congratulated the House on the accession of talent which Mr. Windham brought to it. He subsequently became one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and secretary at war in Pitt's administration. In the latter office, he distinguished himself by his efforts to secure increased pay and pensions to officers and soldiers, as well as for shortening the period of service. About 1807 he was offered a peerage, which he declined. In opposition he delivered several eloquent speeches against the Copenhagen expedition, and the disastrous Walcheren campaign. At a period when the House of Commons listened to the eloquence of Pitt, Burke, and Fox, it was no small honour to be classed, as an orator, as the fourth in a list which included those brilliant names. Such was Mr. Windham's position; and Canning declared, if his oratory was not the most commanding, it was of the most insinuating order. He was a sound scholar and mathematician; and, says Dr. Johnson, was the model of a true English gentleman. b. in London, 1750; d. 1810.

WINDHAM, Charles Ashe, K.C.B., an English general, who was descended of an old Norfolk family, and entered on a military career in 1826. Upon the outbreak of the Crimean war, he was nominated assistant-quartermaster-general of the fourth division. At the battle of Inkermann he distinguished himself by his cool courage, and after the death of Sir G. Cathcart, who fell mortally wounded near him, he held the command of the division until the close of the action. He subsequently led the storming-party, which, under a murderous fire, advanced to take the Redan, and, after the fall of the south side of Sebastopol, was appointed commander of that suburb of the city called the Karabelmaia. For "his distinguished conduct in having, with the greatest intrepidity and coolness, headed the column of attack which assaulted the Russian defences," he was made a major-general, and commander of the Bath. In 1857 he was appointed to a command of the Indian army, and served in the operations against the mutineers. b. in Norfolk, about 1810; d. 1870.

WIRE, Vincent, wing, an English astronomer and astrological writer, was the author of the "Celestial Harmony of the Visible World," an Ephemeris for thirty years; "Computatio Catholica;" and "Astronomia Britannica." His name was for many years affixed to a popular sheet almanack published by the Stationers' Company. Lived in the 17th century.

WINGATE, Edmund, wing-gait, an English mathematician, who, proceeding to France, was appointed English teacher to Henrietta Maria, afterwards queen of Charles I.; but subsequently taking the Covenant, was elected to the Parliament called by Cromwell. He published the "Use of the Rule of Proportion, commonly called Gunter's Scale;" "Natural and Artificial Arithmetic" (this book has gone through many editions); "Tables of Logarithms;" "The Exact Surveyor;" and other works. b. in Yorkshire, 1593; d. 1656.

WINSLOW, James Benigne, wins-lo, a celebrated Danish anatomist, who studied under Duverney, at Paris, where he turned Roman Catholic, and became physician, demonstrator in the Jardin du Roi, and member of the Academy of Sciences. He was the author of "A Course of Anatomy," "Dissertation on the Uncertainty of the Signs of Death," "On Diseases of the Bones," and other works of value. b. at Odense, Denmark, 1669; d. 1760.

WINSLOW, Forbes, a modern English physician, who studied the science of medicine at Aberdeen, and became fellow of the Royal College of Physicians at Edinburgh, member of the Royal College of Surgeons of London, and doctor of civil law in the university of Oxford. Having devoted his attention to the study of mental diseases, he established an asylum for the treatment of insanity at Sussex House, Hammersmith. As a writer upon certain departments of the healing art, he was particularly successful, his more important works being, "Physic and Physicians," "The Anatomy of Suicide," and "On the Preservation of Health of the Body and Mind." In 1857 he was nominated president of the Association of Medical Officers of Hospitals and Asylums for the insane. In 1849 he started the quarterly journal of "Psychological Medicine and Mental Pathology," in which he wrote a number of valuable papers. b. 1810.

WINSOR, Frederic Albert, wins-sor, an enterprising projector, to whom the public is indebted for the plan of lighting the streets with gas. He made his first public experiments at the Lyceum, in the Strand, in 1803, and afterwards lighted with gas Carlton Palace Gardens, on the king's birthday in 1807; and, during 1809 and 1810, lighted one side of Pall Mall. Following up his object with much perseverance, he at length obtained a charter of incorporation for a gas-light and coke company; but did not obtain the amount of remuneration he expected. In 1815 he went to Paris, where he also erected gas-works, and established a company. d. 1830.

WINSTANLEY, William, wins-stan-le, a literary barber, who produced "Lives of the Poets," "Select Lives of England's Worthies," "Historical Rarities," &c. b. about 1690.

WINSTON, Thomas, wins-ston, an eminent English physician, who, in 1602, went abroad, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. On his return, he settled in London, and, in 1615, was chosen professor of anatomy at Gresham College. He was the author of "Anatomical Lectures," b. 1575; d. in London, 1635.

WINT, Peter de, wint, an English water-colour painter, who at first studied engraving, but relinquished it for the department of art in which he subsequently became celebrated. During forty years his landscape views of Kent, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and other English counties, were amongst the greatest attractions of the annual exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water-colours. Although he never ceased to employ the simple methods of the earliest masters of his art, his pictures exhibited to the last great brilliancy and freshness. b. at Stone, Staffordshire, 1734; d. 1849.

WINTER, Jan Willem van, wins-ter, a brave Dutch admiral, who, in 1797, was appointed to the command of a fleet consisting of 27 vessels, which was intended to join the French at Brest; but having been met by the English, under Admiral Duncan, a sanguinary and obstinate fight ensued, and resulted in Van Winter and nine Dutch ships of the line being taken. He remained a prisoner of war in London during some months; and after returning to his native country, was appointed minister-plenipotentiary of the Batavian republic to the government of France. When Louis Bonaparte became king of Holland, he took Van Winter into his favour, and nominated him count of Huesca, marshal of the kingdom, and commander-in-chief upon land and sea. After the annexation of Holland to the French empire, he became an officer of the Legion of Honour, and commander of the fleet at the Texel. b. at the Texel, 1750; d. at Paris, 1812.

WINTOWN, or WYNTOWN, Andrew, wint'-town, a monk and historian of Scotland, who wrote a chronicle of his country in rhyme, in which there is a strange mixture of truth and fable. Sir Walter Scott borrowed some incidents from these poems. Lived early in the 15th century.

WINTRINGHAM, Sir Clifton, wint'-tring-ham, an eminent English physician, who, in 1749, became physician to the duke of Cumberland, and afterwards to George III., who created him a baronet. He published an improved edition of Mead's "Medical Precepts," and other works upon medicine. b. at York, 1710; d. 1794.

WINWOOD, Sir Ralph, wint'-wood, an eminent English statesman, who received the honour of knighthood in 1607, and was sent as ambassador to the States of Holland. In 1614 he was made secretary of state and privy councillor. His "Memoirs of State Affairs" were published after his death. b. at Aytho, Northamptonshire, about 1564; d. in London, 1617.

WISS, Francis, wiss, a learned English divine and antiquary, who became fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and assistant in the Bodleian library. He obtained a rectory in Oxfordshire, was appointed keeper of the archives of the university, and Radcliffe librarian. He published "Annales Elfridi Magni," "Inquiries concerning the First Inhabitants of Europe," and "Observations on the Fabulous Times." b. 1695; d. 1767.

WISEMAN, Nicholas, wiss'-man, a cardinal of the Roman Catholic church, whose father was descended from an ancient English family, but who had settled as a merchant at Waterford, in Ireland, and at Seville. The future dignitary was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood, and became professor of oriental languages, and subsequently rector of the English college at Rome. After being made a bishop, he was, in 1850, nominated by the pope archbishop of Westminster and a cardinal. This step on the part of the papacy led to the passing of an act by which it was made penal to assume ecclesiastical titles in respect to places in the United Kingdom. The cardinal's territorial title was, therefore, a mere empty one. He produced, among other learned works, "Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion," "Horæ Syriacæ," and "Lectures on the Doctrine and Practice of the Catholic Church." He was likewise one of the founders of, and editor and contributor to, the "Dublin Review." b. at Seville, 1802; d. 1865.

WISHART, George, wish'-art, usually styled "the Martyr," an eminent Scottish ecclesiastical reformer, who was at first master of a grammar-school at Montrose; but having promulgated the doctrines of the Reformation there, he was compelled to seek safety by repairing to England. After preaching at Bristol and Cambridge, he returned to his native country in 1543, in the train of the commissioners who went thither to arrange a marriage between Prince Edward and the Queen of Scots. The party of the Reformation having become powerful enough to protect

Witt

Wishart, he began to preach at Dundee, Montrose, and other places, with so much fervour that the people rose and destroyed several ecclesiastical buildings. Wishart has been charged with plotting against Cardinal Beaton's life, and was one of those who asked a reward from Henry VIII. to assassinate the prelate. He was subsequently taken by the cardinal's troops, and condemned to be burnt at the stake, which sentence was carried into effect at St. Andrews, 1546.

WISHART, George, a Scotch prelate, who, after entering into holy orders, became chaplain to the marquis of Montrose, whom he accompanied in his last expedition, and having been taken prisoner, narrowly escaped being put to death. At the Restoration he was made bishop of Edinburgh. He wrote a very curious account of the wars of the marquis of Montrose, which, previously to that nobleman's execution, was hung in derision about his neck. b. in Haddingtonshire, 1609; d. at Edinburgh, 1671.

WITHEER, or WITHEER, George, wit'-er, an English poet, who, having written a poetical satire, entitled "Abuses Stript and Whipt," was committed to the Marshalsea, but continued to write satires and eulogues in prison. The latter possess merit. In the civil wars he was an officer in the parliamentary army, was taken by the royalists, and condemned to be hanged, but was saved by the intercession of Sir John Denham. b. in Hampshire, 1588; d. 1667.

WITKIND, WITTEKING, or WITTOWIND, wit'-t-kind, a Saxon hero, who commanded his countrymen in their wars with Charlemagne. In 772 Charlemagne set forth from Aix-la-Chapelle to subdue the Saxons; but, having advanced as far as Eresburg, at present Stadberg, he was compelled to agree to a truce, in order to prosecute a war with Desiderius, king of the Longobards. Witkind thereupon led an army of Saxons into Frankish territory, which he ravished as far as Cologne, while Charlemagne was absent in Spain. In 779 Charlemagne defeated the Saxons at Bochoit, and, after two years fierce fighting, the Saxon leader was compelled to acknowledge the supremacy of the Frankish monarch and to become a Christian. Witkind is supposed to have been slain in a battle with the Duke of Suabia, in 807.

WISSERS, Herman, wit'-si-us, a learned Dutch Calvinistic divine, who became successively professor of divinity at Franeker, Utrecht, and Leyden. His principal works were, "Historia Hierosolymitana," and "De Economía Fœderum," or, the "Economy of Covenants." This has been translated into English. b. at Enckhaysen, Holland, 1628; d. 1708.

WITZ, John de, wit, a celebrated Dutch statesman and patriot, who was the son of one of the leaders of the party which, in the States-general of Holland, opposed the ambitious designs of the house of Orange. Upon completing his studies, he was appointed, through the influence of his brother Cornelius, pensionary of the city of Dordrecht; after ably fulfilling the duties of which office during two years, he became grand-pensionary of Holland. Thus placed at the head of the Dutch republic, he conducted public affairs with great wisdom, placed the marine in an efficient state, reorganized the finances, and directed the naval war in which his country was engaged with England. After several fiercely-contested sea-fights between the English and Dutch, peace was concluded in 1654. In 1665 war again broke out between the Dutch and English; but, after some naval engagements, peace was concluded in 1667. In the latter year he induced the States-general to proclaim a "perpetual edict," by which the office of stadtholder, which had been hereditary in the house of Orange, was abolished for ever. In 1672 Louis XIV. invaded Holland; the French had also been intriguing with Charles II., with the Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Munster. Accordingly, war was declared against the United Provinces by all these rulers; and, the Dutch having suffered a series of reverses both upon sea and land, a general discontent prevailed in the Republic. The partisans of the House of Orange excited the hatred of the people against the De Witts, as the authors of their misfortunes. An attempt was made to assassinate John de Witt, but failed: Cornelius was arrested upon a false charge of conspiring to poison the Prince of Orange, was submitted to the torture, and sentenced to be banished. John prepared to accompany his brother into exile; but, as they were leaving the Hague, the savage populace murdered the patriots in the most brutal manner. Thus fell these virtuous brothers, one of whom had served his country as chief magistrate during twenty years, whilst the other had, by his sound sense and probity, given efficient support to every measure which might contribute to the welfare of his countrymen. John de Witt was born at Dordrecht, 1625; killed at the Hague, 1672.—Cornelius was born at Dordrecht, 1623; killed at the Hague, 1672.

WODROW, Robert, wod'-ro, an eminent Scotch historian and antiquary, who was educated for the ecclesiastical profession, and became minister of Eastwood, in Renfrewshire. He took an active part in the church politics of his time, and was an energetic opponent of the Church Patronage Act, forming one of the deputation sent to London at the accession of George I., to request its repeal. His principal works were, "History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution;" and a "History of the Church of Scotland," which was left in manuscript. b. at Glasgow, 1679; d. 1734.

WORMINGTON, Margaret, wof'-ting-ton, an eminent Irish actress, who made her first appearance in London at Covent Garden Theatre, in 1740, in the character of Sir Harry Wildair, in which she acquired great popularity, and subsequently became one of the leading actresses of her time. b. at Dublin, 1718; d. 1760.

WORME, Charles Godfrey, wo'-eed, a learned Polish divine, who repaired to England, where he became minister of the German chapel in the Savoy, and of the Dutch chapel at St. James's, London, and also one of the assistant librarians of the British Museum. He was deeply learned in the Eastern languages, particularly the Coptic, and edited several important works, particularly the "Alexandrian MS. of the New Testament" in the British Museum, and the Egyptian grammar of Scholtz. d. 1790.

WORCE, Rev. John, wof'-kot, usually styled "Peter Pindar," an eminent English burlesque poet, who was educated for the profession of medicine, and, in 1767, became physician to Sir William Trelawney, governor of Jamaica. He subsequently returned to England and entered into orders; but after having been disappointed of a valuable living in the island of Jamaica, set ~~u~~ in practice as a physician in Cornwall.

Having discovered the self-taught artist Opie at Truro, he repaired with him to London, and there distinguished himself as a writer of burlesque poetry. His productions principally consisted of odes and satires directed against George III., Pitt, and the leading men of the time. An edition of his collected works, in 4 vols., was published in 1816. b. at Dodbroke, Devonshire, about 1738; d. in London, 1810.

WOLF, Hieronymus, wolf, an eminent German writer, whose early life was passed in the pursuit of knowledge under the most adverse circumstances. In 1557 he became professor of Greek at Augsburg, and, subsequently, public librarian to the same city. His principal works were, editions of Demosthenes, Suidas, Isocrates, and notes upon Cicero. b. at Dettingen, 1516; d. at Augsburg, 1580.

WOLF, John Christopher, an eminent German divine, who became professor of Oriental languages, and afterwards rector of the gymnasium of Hamburg. In 1716 he was nominated minister of the Lutheran church of St. Catharine, in the same city. His principal works were, treatise upon the Manicheans, "Bibliotheca Hebraica," and "Historia Lexicorum Hebraicorum." b. at Wernigerode, 1683; d. at Hamburg, 1739.

WOLF, Frederic Augustus, a celebrated German scholar, whose application and ability were so extraordinary, that before he had attained his 17th year he had become acquainted with the greatest writers in the English, French, German, Italian, and Spanish languages. The son of a musician, he was intended for an organist, but he himself chose rather to pursue philology. In 1777 he proceeded to the university of Göttingen, where he studied with the greatest assiduity during two years, afterwards receiving an appointment as teacher at Ilfeld. Having published an edition of Plato's "Symposium," his great attainments became known, and he was in 1783 appointed professor of philosophy in the university of Halle, retaining the office until 1806. After the peace of Tilsit he was nominated privy councillor by the Prussian government. An active promoter of the establishment of the university of Berlin, he was appointed to a professorship at that seat of learning. Having suffered in his health from his great application, he in 1824 set out upon a tour through the south of France, but was overtaken by death at Marseilles. The principal works of this, the greatest of modern German scholars, are, "History of Roman Literature," editions, with notes and commentaries, of the writings of Cicero, and of Demosthenes' oration against Leptines; some of the "Dialogues" of Plato, and the "Encyclopædia of Philology." In his famous "Prolegomena ad Homerum," first sought to establish that the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were the works of various rhapsodists, which were afterwards collected, and that such a personage as Homer, the sole author of these epics, never existed. (See HOMER.) These bold assertions were supported by extraordinary learning, and still continue to engage the attention of the most eminent European scholars. Wolf was likewise the founder of philological science. b. near Norhausen, 1759; d. at Marseilles, 1824.

WOLFE, Rev. Charles, woolf, an eminent Irish divine and poet, who held a curacy in the county Tyrone, and produced a number of melodious pieces of verse; but is principally remembered as the author of the celebrated ode called "The Burial of Sir John Moore." Stricken with consumptive disease, he was compelled to relinquish his spiritual calling, and, after vainly seeking health during a residence at Bordeaux, in Devonshire, and at Cork, he was carried off by death in 1823. B. in Ireland, 1791.

WOLFE, James, a celebrated English military commander, who entered the army at an early age, and, possessing great military talents, improved by assiduity and experience, soon distinguished himself as a brave and skilful officer. He was present at the battle of La-feldt, and in every subsequent engagement in Germany in the war which terminated with the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1749. Appointed colonel of the 67th regiment in 1758, he brought it to such a pitch of exact discipline, that as long as the determined bravery of the six battalions on the plain of Minden is recorded in history, the stand of that regiment will be remembered to his honour. He was greatly instrumental in the taking of Louis-burg, and had scarcely returned thence when he was appointed by Pitt to the chief command of the important expedition against Quebec, in 1759. This undertaking afforded ample scope for the exercise of his great military talents. By his excellent strategic dispositions he gained a position upon the hills which command Quebec. Montcalm, his brave adversary, contested the possession of the city with great skill and determination; but, after an obstinate fight, the French were compelled to give way. But the accomplished English general was mortally wounded in the moment of victory; on the news of which he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, "I thank God; I die contented." B. in Kent, 1726; killed, 1759.

WOLFF, John Christian von, wolf, an eminent German mathematician, who first studied at Jena, and afterwards at Leipzig, where he published a "Thesis on the Manner of Studying Philosophy." In 1707 he became professor of mathematics at Halle, and in 1721 was appointed counsellor to the court of the king of Prussia; but some of his religious and metaphysical opinions giving offence to the faculty of theology, he was banished from Halle; on which he removed to Cassel, became counsellor to the landgrave, and obtained a professorship at Marburg. He was also honoured with marks of distinction by the king of Sweden, and was elected a member of the Academies of Sciences of Paris and Petersburg, and fellow of the Royal Society of London. In 1741 he was recalled by Frederic the Great, who appointed him privy councillor, vice-chancellor, and professor of international law. He was afterwards made chancellor of the university, and the elector of Bavaria created him a baron. His principal works are, "A Course of Mathematics," "Philosophia Rationalis," a "System of Metaphysics," and a "Dictionary of the Mathematics." B. at Breslau, 1679; D. 1754.

WOLFF, Joseph, a distinguished missionary and traveller, was born of Jewish parents, but becoming a convert to Christianity, studied at Rome, from which he was banished as a recusant against the doctrines of Roman Catholicism, and completed his education in Germany. In 1837 he was ordained deacon by the bishop of New Jersey, U.S., and priest by the bishop of Dromore, in 1838. He made several journeys to Bokhara, partly in search of the lost Ten Tribes of Israel, and partly to ascertain the fate of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly, who were murdered in that region. Dr. Wolff published a narrative of his adventures under the title of, "A Journey to Bokhara;" and wrote besides six volumes of "Travels." He was D.D. of St. Andrews, LL.D. of Trinity College, Dublin; and in 1845 became vicar of Isle Brewers, Somerset. His first wife was a daughter of the second Earl of Orford. B. at Weilersbach, near Bamberg, 1785; D. 1862.

WOLLASTON, William, wol-las-ton, an eminent English divine, who was educated at Sidney College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts. He became assistant and afterwards master of Birmingham school; but, becoming possessed of a good fortune by the death of a relative, he retired to London, and devoted himself to the pursuit of learning. His principal work was entitled, "The Religion of Nature Delineated," and is an attempt to prove the truth of religion on mathematical principles. It is a curious but very abstruse work. B. in Staffordshire, 1659; D. 1724.

WOLLASTON, William Hyde, an eminent English natural philosopher, who was educated for the medical profession, and took his degree as M.D. in 1793; but, after practising during a short period, resolved to devote himself exclusively to scientific investigations. He became member and secretary of the Royal Society, and member of the Board of Longitude. To him science is indebted for the discovery of two metals—palladium and rhodium; the invention of the reflective goniometer, of the camera lucida, and of the periscopic glasses; and likewise for a method of rendering the metal platina malleable. An account of his various researches was furnished by himself to the "Transactions" of the Royal Society. B. 1766; D. 1828.

WOLLSTONECRAFT, Mary. (See GODWIN, Mary.)

WOLSEY, Thomas, wool'-see, a celebrated English cardinal, who is supposed to have been the son of a butcher. He received his education at Magdalen College, Oxford, and became tutor to the three sons of Grey, marquis of Dorset, who gave him the rectory of Lymington, in Somersetshire. Having made the acquaintance of Sir John Nefant, treasurer of Calais, he was introduced by that personage to court, where, making his way by his great abilities and astuteness, he gained the favour of Henry VII., who sent him on an embassy to Flanders, and at his return made him dean of Lincoln. After the accession of Henry VIII., Wolsey rose to still higher favour, was presented to the living of Torrington, in Devon, appointed registrar of the Garter, canon of Windsor, and dean of York; and, attending the king to Tournay, in France, was made bishop of that city. In 1514 he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and in the same year to the archbishopric of York. He was at this time in the zenith of power, and held complete ascendancy over the mind of the king, who made him lord chancellor, and obtained for him a cardinalship. He was also nominated the pope's legate. His influence and income were enormous, and he lived in a princely style, till he lost the esteem of his capricious master. His fall was mainly owing to these causes.—He had counselled the king to divorce Catharine, but not to marry

Womack

Anne Boleyn; thus making enemies of the queen, and of a powerful party which supported her at court. He also, as a cardinal, represented the power and arrogance of the papacy, which Henry VIII. had resolved to destroy in his dominions. Accordingly, he was first stripped of his dignities and property, and subsequently arrested upon a false charge of treason; the earl of Northumberland being ordered to bring him to London to take his trial. On his way he was seized with dysentery, and was compelled to halt at the monastery of Leicester, where he died three days after. On his death-bed he exclaimed, "Had I served my God as faithfully as I have the king, he would not have forsaken me in my old age." He was a man of unbounded ambition and of great arrogance, but of considerable learning and great policy. He founded Christchurch College, Oxford, and built Hampton Court Palace. b. at Ipswich, Suffolk, 1471; d. 1530.

WOMACK, Laurence, wô'-mak, a learned English prelate, who, in 1600, was installed archdeacon of Suffolk, and in 1608 nominated bishop of St. David's. His principal works were, "The Examination of Tilens before the Triers," a book against the Puritans; "The Re-vult of False Principles, or Error convinced by its own Evidence;" and some other books, chiefly in answer to the Calvinists. b. 1612; d. 1685.

WOOD, Anthony, wood', an eminent English antiquary and biographer, who was educated at Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of M.A., and in 1689 completed his history of that university. This work was written in English, but, before being published, was translated into Latin. He published, in 1681, his "Athenae Oxonienses," which is a valuable collection of the lives of writers and bishops educated at Oxford. Bishop Bernard having attacked this work, it was defended by the author in a "Vindication." b. at Oxford 1632; d. 1695.

WOOD, Robert, an eminent Irish archaeologist, who travelled upon an expedition through Asia Minor and Syria; and, after his return, produced the "Ruins of Palmyra" and the "Ruins of Baalbec, &c.," two works copiously illustrated, and remarkable for their artistic merits. He afterwards became under-secretary of state, and wrote an "Essay on the Original Genius of Homer." b. 1716; d. at Putney, 1771.

WOOD, Sir Matthew, Bart., M.P., and alderman and Lord Mayor of London, was the son of a serge manufacturer at Tiverton, and at the age of 11 years was employed in his father's factory, and at 14 was apprenticed to Mr. Newton of Exeter, who carried on business as a chemist and druggist. After serving his time, and being for a few years employed as a traveller in the drug trade, he commenced business on his own account in London, at first as a chemist, and subsequently as a hop merchant, in which latter trade he acquired a fortune. After serving some minor offices in the city, Mr. Wood was elevated to the mayoralty in 1810, and gave such universal satisfaction that he was re-elected in 1816. During his second mayoralty he gained a still higher degree of public favour, by saving the lives of three poor Irishmen who were sentenced to be hanged, on the perjured testimony of three police officers, named Brock, Vaughan, and Pelham. The livery, in token of their approval of his conduct on this occasion, sent him name up a third time for the mayoralty; but the court of aldermen deeming this too great a departure from the ordinary rule, passed his name over. During his second term of office he was chosen M.P. for London, and from that time till his death was constantly returned, and on each case one, at the head of the poll. He gained great notoriety for the zeal with which he espoused the cause of the unfortunate Caroline. Mr. James Wood, banker, Garter, and his sister, a maiden lady, left the old man a handsome fortune, amounting, after several deductions from litigation, &c., to upwards of a quarter of a million of money. He was created a baronet during Lord Melbourne's administration, in 1837. b. 1767; d. 1843.—His son, Mr. Western Wood, succeeded Lord John Russell as M.P. for London in 1881.

WOODSOM, Richard, wood'-son, an eminent civilian, was educated at Pembroke and Magdalen Colleges, Oxford; and chosen Vinerian professor, on the resignation of Sir Robert Chambers. He wrote "Elements of Jurisprudence," "A Systematic View of the Laws of England," and "A brief Vindication of the Rights of the British Legislature." b. 1745; d. 1822.

WOODALL, John, wood'-all, an English surgeon, who distinguished himself during the plague which prevailed in the early part of the reign of James I. He was author of "The Surgeon's Mate," and "Vaticum." b. about 1556; d. about 1640.

WOODFALL, William, wood'-fal, a printer and publisher, who became in some measure a public character from his being exposed to a prosecution as publisher of the famous "Letters of Junius." He was concerned along with Mr. Bensley and Mr. John Walter of the "Times," in perfecting a project for applying steam to the purposes of printing, but left to the last-named gentleman the credit of successfully working the invention. b. about 1745; d. 1803.

WOODHOUSE, Robert, wood'-house, an eminent English astronomer, who became fellow of Caius College; in 1820 Lucasian professor of mathematics, and in 1823 professor of astronomy in the university of Cambridge. In 1824 he was appointed superintendent of the observatory at the same place. His principal works were, "Principles of Analytical Calculation," "Elements of Trigonometry," and a treatise on Astronomy. b. at Norwich, 1773; d. 1827.

WOODVILLE or WYKEVILLE, Elizabeth, wood'-vil, widow of Sir John Grey, who was slain in the battle of St. Albans in 1455. On her applying for the restoration of her husband's estate, Edward IV. fell in love with, and married her. The Princess Elizabeth was the fruit of this union, who married Henry VII., and thus united the houses of York and Lancaster.

WOODVILLE, Anthony, Earl Rivers, brother of the preceding, an accomplished nobleman of the 15th century, who, in consequence of his sister having been married to Edward IV., shared in all the vicissitudes which befel that warlike but luxurious monarch, and became governor of Calais, captain-general of the king's forces, and governor of Prince Edward. On the death of king Edward, the Earl assembled a body of troops, with the intention of crowning his nephew; but his design was frustrated by the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., who caused Earl Rivers to be beheaded, without trial, in the castle of Pontefract, June 13, 1483. b. 1443.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Woodward

WOODWARD, John, wood-ward, an eminent English physician, who in 1692 became professor of physic at Gresham College. In 1695 Archbishop Tenison conferred on him the degree of M.D. In the same year he published a "Natural History of the Earth," in which he combated the theory held by most writers of his day, that the corals, shells, and fishes found embedded in rocks, were "mere mineral substances." Though his work contains many errors, it is full of glimpses of real geological truth. He founded the professorship of geology at the university of Cambridge. b. in Derbyshire, 1665; d. in London, 1728.

WOOLLETT, William, wool'-let, an eminent English engraver, who became engraver to George III., and produced, among other fine works, "The Death of General Wolfe," "The Battle of La Hogue," "Cicero at his Villa," after Wilson; and some landscapes, after Claude. b. at Maidstone, Kent, 1735; d. 1785.

WOOLSTON, Thomas, wool'-ston, an English deistical writer, who was educated at Sidney College, Cambridge, where he proceeded to his degree of B.D. In 1705 he published "The Old Apology for the truth of the Christian Religion against the Jews and Gentiles revived," which was little noticed; but in his "Six Discourses on the Miracles of Christ," he exhibited such heterodox opinions as to occasion several answers to his work, and a prosecution against himself. He was sentenced to be imprisoned during a year, and to pay a fine of £100. b. at Northampton, 1669; d. in the rules of the King's Bench, 1738.

WORDSWORTH, William, words'-werth, an eminent English poet, who was the son of an attorney, and became a student of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1787, where he took his B.A. degree in 1791. At this period he was an enthusiastic republican; and, soon after leaving college, repaired to France, where he became acquainted with some of the members of the Girondist party. Fortunately he was obliged to return to England at the end of 1792, shortly before the execution of Louis XVI. Long devoted to poetical pursuits, he, in 1793, produced his first verses, entitled "An Evening Walk," and "Descriptive Sketches taken during a Pedestrian Tour among the Alps." About this time he entertained the intention of studying for the bar, proposing to support himself in the interim by writing political articles for the newspaper press; but a friend having left him some money in order that he might cultivate his poetical talents, he resolved to entirely devote himself to verse. He removed to a rural retreat in Dorsetshire, where he composed his "Salisbury Plain, or Gullit and Sorrow," and commenced the tragedy called "The Borderers." In 1797 he became acquainted with Coleridge, then a resident at Bristol; and, says Wordsworth, "for the sake of being near him, when he removed to Nether-Stowey, in Somersetshire, we removed to Alfoxden, three miles from that place." In 1798 appeared a small volume, entitled "Lyrical Ballads," which was from the pens of the two poets. It contained the "Ancient Mariner," by Coleridge, and twenty-two pieces of verse by Wordsworth. The volume produced no impression upon the public, and the copyright was afterwards presented to the two authors. After making a tour in Germany with Coleridge in 1798-9, he went to reside at Grasmere, removing to Allan Bank in 1803,

Worm

There also resided, or visited, Southey, Coleridge, De Quincey, and Will-on; and it was to this congregation of kindred poetical spirits that the term "Lake School" was applied by the reviewers. Against those reviewers, and against a public that regarded their works with indifference, Wordsworth and the "Lakists" struggled until the year 1813, at which time the poetic genius of himself and his disciples began to be recognized. Meanwhile he had produced a new edition of his "Lyrical Ballads," "Poems," "Essay on Epitaphs," and had written portions of "The Prelude," and "The Excursion." In 1813 he settled at Rydal Mount, which continued to be his residence until his death. In the following year he published "The Excursion," relative to which Jeffrey wrote, "This will never do." "The White Doe of Rylston," "Peter Bell," "Memorials of a Tour upon the Continent," "Sonnets on the River Duddon," "The Waggoner," and "The Prelude," were given to the world after "The Excursion." During the interval 1813-42, he held the office of distributor of stamps for the county of Westmoreland. In the latter year he was granted a pension of £300 per annum; and in 1843 became the successor of Southey as poet-laureate. "The influence of Wordsworth," says an eminent authority, "on the literature, and especially on the poetry of Britain and America, has been immense, and is far yet from being exhausted." A complete edition of his poems, published under the poet's own supervision, was produced in seven volumes in 1842. b. at Cockermouth, Cumberland, 1770; d. 1850.

WORDSWORTH, Rev. Christopher, a learned English divine, who was the youngest brother of the poet-laureate, and after becoming fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, entered into orders, was appointed domestic chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury, subsequently being preferred to a rectory in Norfolk, and the deanery of Bocking, in Essex. His principal works were, "Ecclesiastical Biography, or the Lives of Eminent Men connected with the History of Religion in England;" and "Who wrote Eikon Basilike?" In 1820 he was nominated master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in which office he was succeeded by Dr. Whewell in 1841. b. at Cockermouth, 1774; d. in Essex, 1846.

WORDSWORTH, Christopher, D.D., an English divine and learned writer, was the youngest son of the preceding, and became fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; public orator at the same seat of learning in 1836; head-master of Harrow School, retaining the post until 1844, and archdeacon of Westminster in 1855. He wrote a number of works, the most important of which were, "Memoirs of William Wordsworth, Poet-laureate," "Saint Hippolytus and the Church of Rome," "Athens and Attica;" "Theophilus Anglicanus;" and "Lectures upon the 'Apocalypse.'" b. 1807.

WORDLIDGE, Thomas, wor'-lidj, an English portrait-painter, who also excelled in executing copies of the etchings of Rembrandt. "For the greater part of his life," says Walpole, "he painted portraits in miniature; he afterwards, with worse success, performed them in oil; but at last acquired reputation and money by etchings in the manner of Rembrandt." His best piece is copied from that painter. b. at Peterborough, Northamptonshire, 1700; d. 1766.

WORM, or WORMIUS, Olaus, wor'-me-us, an eminent Danish physician, historian, and antiquary, who, after travelling in France, Germany, and England, became successively professor of medicine, literature, and chemistry at Copenhagen, and was appointed physician to the king and rector of the university. His works, which were written in Latin, were principally descriptions of the natural history of Denmark, treatises upon medicine, dissertation on the early history and antiquities of Denmark and the history of Norway. b. at Aarhus Jutland, 1688; d. at Copenhagen, 1654.

WORNUM, Ralph Nicholson, wor'-num, a modern English writer upon art subjects, who was educated for the profession of a painter in England, and at Dresden, Rome, Munich, and Paris. In 1839 he established himself in London as a portrait-painter; but after a few years relinquished this pursuit for literature, with which he had for some time been partially occupied. He wrote articles upon ancient and modern art for Smith's "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities" and the "Penny Cyclopædia," as well as several biographies of painters for the "Dictionary of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." Among the more important of his separate works may be quoted, "History of Painting, Ancient and Modern," and "Analysis of Ornament." He also edited the "Lectures on Painting, by Barry, Fuseli, and Opie," and "Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting in England." In 1855 he became secretary and keeper of the National Gallery. b. at Thornton, Durham, 1812.

WORONZOW, Michael Marionowitch, Count, wo'-ron'-zov, a Russian statesman and diplomatist, who became, under the Empress Elizabeth, vice-chancellor, and, afterwards, chancellor of Russia; in which office he displayed great abilities, till, finding himself opposed by a strong and vindictive party at the court, he resigned his functions and retired into private life. b. 1714; d. at Moscow, 1767.

WORONZOW, Michael Semenowitch, Prince, an eminent Russian general and statesman, who was nephew of the preceding. His youth, up to the age of 16, was passed in England, where his father was Russian ambassador, and where the young prince acquired a perfect knowledge of English language and manners. When he had attained his 19th year, he entered the military service of his country, and fought against the Turks, and against the French at Borodino and at Leipzig, where he commanded the Russian cavalry. During the occupation of France by the allies, he commanded the Russian forces, and, after his return to Russia, became governor of the Caucasus. At his magnificent palace at Aloupka, in the Crimea, he was wont to give a warm welcome to English visitors. Opposed to the war between England and Russia, he, during the early portion of it, lived retired at Tiflis, and afterwards obtained leave to visit Carlsbad. His sister married the earl of Pembroke, and was the mother of the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, afterwards Lord Herbert. b. at Moscow, 1782; d. at Odessa, 1856.

WORMING, Andrew, wor'-ring, an Austrian typographer, who perfected and introduced the art of nature-printing. At an early age he entered the imperial printing-office at Vienna, and, after proceeding through the different departments, rose to the position of manager. Taking up an idea of Professor Haidinger, he, under the supervision of Councillor Auer, the director of the establishment, entered upon a series of well-considered experiments, the result of which was the discovery of the art of nature-printing. In this process, an object is placed upon a softened copper-plate; enormous pressure is applied, and the plate receives from the plant, or lace, or other substance, a complete transference of its outline and details. The copper-plate is next hardened, and rendered capable of being printed from. This beautiful art was first introduced into England by Mr. Henry Bradbury, who became acquainted with it while studying at the imperial printing-office, Vienna, and who was charged with having surreptitiously obtained it. Mr. Bradbury replied to the effect, that the honours of the invention were due quite as much to Mr. Kyhl, a Danish goldsmith, and Professor Knipphof, who, in 1761, produced 1200 coloured specimens of plants by the process,—as to the Viennese typographer. Both in England and in Austria some beautiful botanical works have been produced by the process. Worrington was born at Vienna, about 1806.

WORSLEY, Sir Richard, war'-le, an English writer, who became comptroller of the household of George III., governor of the Isle of Wight, and representative in Parliament for Newport. In the early part of his life he purchased, in various parts of Europe, a fine collection of marbles, statues, and other relics of antiquity, of which a description was engraved and published in a work entitled "Museum Worsleianum," upon which he spent £27,000. He also wrote a "History of the Isle of Wight." b. in the Isle of Wight, 1751; d. 1805.

WORTON, Edward, wor'-ton, a learned English physician, who became physician to Henry VIII., and wrote a work upon natural history, entitled "De Differentiis Animalium." b. at Oxford, 1492; d. 1555.

WORTON, Sir Henry, an eminent English writer and statesman, who having proceeded to the degree of M.A. at Oxford, went abroad, where he remained nearly nine years, and upon his return was appointed one of the secretaries of the earl of Essex. After the earl's apprehension in 1601, Wotton fled to the continent, and became intimate with Ferdinand I., grand-duke of Tuscany, who having discovered a plot against the life of James VI. of Scotland, sent Wotton with letters to warn the Scottish monarch, under the name of Octavio Baldi. When James came to the English throne, he conferred on Wotton the honour of knighthood, and sent him as ambassador to the republic of Venice and other states. In 1623 he was created Duke of Buckingham," "Characters of some of the Kings of England," "Essay on Education," and poems, printed in the "Reliquiæ Wottonianæ," by Izaak Walton. b. in Kent, 1568; d. 1639.

WORTON, William, a learned English divine, who obtained a fellowship of St. John's College, Cambridge. His principal works were, "Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning," which book was ridiculed by Swift in his "Battle of Books;" "An Abridgment of the Roman History;" "Memoirs of the Cathedrals of St. David's and Llandaff;" "Letter to a Student of Divinity." b. at Wrentham, Suffolk, 1606; d. at Buxted, Essex, 1720.

brated Dutch painter, who excelled in depicting road-side, hunting, and marauding scenes. Though he enriched those who as a matter of speculation bought his pictures, he lived and died a poor man. b. at Haarlem, 1620; d. 1688. —His brothers, Peter and John, were both distinguished artists.

WRANGEL, Charles Gustavus, ran'-gel, grand marshal of Sweden, who distinguished himself as a naval and military commander. He defeated the Danish fleet in 1644, the Imperial army near Augsburg in 1648, and the Dutch fleet at the passage of the Sound in 1658. b. 1613; d. 1678.

WRAXALL, Sir Nathaniel William, rax'-all, an English writer and politician, who in early life was employed in the civil service of the East India Company, and after returning to Europe in 1772, spent several years in travelling over the continent. He was also sent upon a private mission by Caroline Matilda, the queen of Denmark, to her brother George III. In 1780 he was elected member of Parliament, where he supported the measures of Pitt. He was a voluminous writer, and produced, "Cursory Remarks made in a Tour through the Northern Parts of Europe;" "Memoirs of the Courts of Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna;" "Historical Memoirs of My Own Time," in which he wrote a libel upon the Russian ambassador, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and fined £500. He was created a baronet in 1813, and had previously received 1000 guineas from George III. for private services. b. at Bristol, 1751; d. at Dover, 1831.

WRAY, Robert Bateman, rai, an eminent English engraver of gems, who was brought up to the business of a seal-engraver; but becoming possessed of great artistic skill, he devoted himself to the delineation of ancient sculptures and of historical portraits upon hard stones, after the style of the ancient Greek masters. His works were sold by Mr. Tassi, the eminent medallist, and the reputation of Wray became, in the course of time, European, his gems not being excelled by the best Italian engravers. The duke of Northumberland, Lord Arundel, and other celebrated connoisseurs, were among his patrons. His finest works were, "The Dying Cleopatra," "Medusa's Head," "Flora," "Madonna," "Milton," "Cicero," "Shakspeare," and "Antinous." b. in Wiltshire, 1715; d. at Salisbury, 1770.

WREDE, Charles Philip, Prince, reed (Germ. erai'-de(r)), a celebrated Bavarian general, who at first served with the Austrian armies against the French; but after the king of Bavaria had become the ally of Napoleon, General Wrede was appointed to a command in the "Grand Army" of the French, which entered Germany in 1806. While in command of the French vanguard, he took prisoners 1500 Austrians after the battle of Memmingen; and having distinguished himself at the siege of Dantzic, in the Tyrol, and at the battle of Wagram, he was created a field-marshal of the Bavarian service, and count of the French empire. In 1812 he was appointed to the command of the Bavarian cavalry in the grand army which invaded Russia, and during the retreat ably seconded Marshal Ney in covering the retreat of the flying soldiery. In 1813, Bavaria having detached herself from France, Marshal Wrede was sent to join the Austrians against his former ions in arms, and after the battle of

Leipsic, he was ordered to post himself in the forest of Hanau, and there intercept Napoleon and his army, then in full retreat upon French territory. The battle which ensued was severely contested, and Marshal Wrede held the road through the forest against Napoleon himself during several hours. The French emperor at length cleared his way by a terrific charge of the cavalry and artillery of the guard. Shortly afterwards Wrede was severely wounded; but in the following year he entered France at the head of a Bavarian army, and defeated Marshals Marmont and Oudinot at Lesmont and at Bursur-Aube. After the return of Napoleon from Elba, Marshal Wrede again entered French territory, and remained there until the peace. He subsequently became Prince of Eillingen, and generalissimo of the armies of Bavaria. b. at Heidelberg, 1767; d. in Franconia, 1838.

WREN, Matthew, ren, a learned English prelate, who took his doctor's degree at the university of Cambridge, and afterwards became master of Peter-house, vice-chancellor of the university, in 1623 dean of Windsor, subsequently bishop of Hereford, and in 1636 bishop of Norwich; whence, in two years, he was translated to Ely. At the beginning of the civil war he was committed to the Tower, where he remained till the Restoration. He wrote a book against the Socinians and some controversial tracts. b. in London, 1585; d. 1667.

WREN, Sir Christopher, a celebrated English architect, who at the age of 14 was sent to Wadham College, Oxford, and in 1653 elected a fellow of All Souls'. In 1657 he was chosen professor of astronomy at Gresham College, but removed to Oxford in 1660, on being appointed Savilian professor of astronomy. He commenced his career as an architect on being nominated, in 1661, assistant to the surveyor-general, Sir John Denham. The same year he was made doctor of civil law. In 1665 he was appointed architect for rebuilding St. Paul's Cathedral; and after the fire of London, he drew up the plan of a "New London," which was presented to the king, but was not adopted. In 1668 he became surveyor-general of his majesty's works. Being now very extensively employed as an architect, he resigned his professorship in 1673, and the year following received the honour of knighthood. In 1680 he was chosen president of the Royal Society. He sat several times in Parliament. His greatest work, the present edifice of St. Paul's, was executed, not from his first and favourite design, but from a second one. It was commenced in 1675; divine service was first celebrated in the choir in 1697; and the last stone of the lantern was laid by the great architect's son in 1710—the stupendous work thus occupying thirty-five years in its erection. His other works are, the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford; the churches of St. Sepulchre, Newgate; St. Lawrence, Jewry; St. Michael's, Cornhill; St. Mary-le-Bow; St. Stephen's, Walbrook; St. Mary-at-Hill; St. Benet Fink; St. Bride's, Fleet Street; St. Swinith's, St. Antholine's, Watling Street; St. James's, Westminster; St. Clement's, Eastcheap; St. Martin's, Ludgate; St. Andrew's, Holborn; Christ Church, Newgate; tower and spire of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East; towers of west front of Westminster Abbey; the Royal Exchange, London, destroyed by fire, Jan. 10, 1838; buildings at Cambridge; Custom House, London; Temple Bar; the Monument, London; Royal WALTON, Edward, rite, an eminent English mathematician, who in 1589 accompanied Sir George, earl of Cumberland, in his expedition to the Azores. In 1599 he published his "Errors of Navigation Corrected," in which he lays down the true method of constructing a sea-chart, upon the plan now known as "Mercator's Projection." He also constructed a "Table of Meridional Parts," and "Tables of the Sun's Declination," which are still in use.

under Hudson, and in 1770 went to Italy, where he resided two years, and improved himself by studying the works of the greatest masters. On his return to England he settled in his native town. His landscapes, and many of his historical pictures, are painted in an excellent manner. B. at Derby, 1784; p. 1797.

Warez, Thomas, an eminent modern writer upon antiquarian subjects, who commenced his literary career while a student at Trinity College, Cambridge, and rapidly secured a reputation by his papers upon early English history and popular antiquities. In 1838 he assisted to found the Camden Society, of which he became secretary. In 1843 he contributed to the establishment of the British Archaeological Association, of whose "Journal" he was during several years the editor. He subsequently became correspondent of the French Academy of Inscriptions, of the Society of Antiquaries of France, and of the Paris Ethnological Society, as well as of most of the leading learned societies on the continent. He wrote voluminously; some of the most important of his learned works being, "The Political Songs of England, from the reign of John to that of Edward II.," "Queen Elizabeth and her Times," "Specimens of Christmas Carols," "Essays on the Literature, Popular Superstitions, and History of England in the Middle Ages," "The Celt, the Roman, and the Saxon," &c.

Wriothesley, Thomas, earl of Southampton, vis-oh-lee, an English statesman, who, upon the outbreak of the civil war, espoused the cause of the king, and was in 1645 appointed one of the commissioners for the treaty of peace at Uxbridge. After the death of Charles I., Lord Southampton was permitted to retire into private life in England. At the Restoration, he was appointed a member of the Privy Council, and in 1680 lord high treasurer. Pepys, in his "Diary," thus speaks of this nobleman's death: "Great talk of the good end that my lord-treasurer made; closing his eyes and wetting his mouth, and bidding adieu with the greatest content and freedom in the world; and is said to die with the cleanest hands that ever any lord-treasurer did." p. 1687.

bishop, who became a favourite with the Conqueror, whom he induced to transfer the diocese of Worcester, held by Wulfstan, from the jurisdiction of the archbishopric of York to that of Canterbury. At the death of the Conqueror, he paid court to Rufus, and when Roger de Montgomery, an adherent of Duke Robert of Normandy, besieged Worcester, the Anglo-Saxon bishop opposed a successful resistance to the rebels. By some he is held to have been the author of that portion of the Saxon Chronicle beginning from 1034 and terminating with the death of William the Conqueror. He rebuilt the cathedral of Worcester. A full biography of this spirited Anglo-Saxon bishop has been written by William of Malmesbury, b. in Warwickshire, about 1093; d. 1193.

WULSTAN, or WULFSTAN, wool'-stun, an Anglo-Saxon monk and writer, who wrote, in Latin prose, a "Life of Bishop Ethelwold," and a poem upon the miracles of St. Swithin. The former has been printed, but the latter remains in manuscript. Lived in the 10th century.

W. SEER, Dagobert Sigismund, Count von, werf (Germ. coorn'-ser), field-marshal in the sa- an service. In his youth he served in the French army, whence he passed into that of the empress Maria Theresa, and rose to the highest military rank. In 1793 he was sent against the French, whom he defeated, and compelled to retreat in disorder into Upper Alsace. He then took Illgenau and some other strong places, but was afterwards attacked by Pichegru, compelled to abandon all that he had taken, and totally defeated at Frischweiler. The year following he commanded the army of the Upper Rhine, and made himself master of Mannheim. In 1798 he commanded in Italy, where he was defeated by Bonaparte, and was at last obliged to throw himself into Mantua, which he defended till the extremity of famine obliged him to capitulate. n. in Alsace, 1794; n. at Vienna, 1797.

WYATT, Sir Thomas, the Elder, wi'-at, an English poet and diplomatist, who, after completing his education at the university of Cambridge, received a post at court. Henry VII. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and employed him in several embassies. He wrote some elegant songs and sonnets, printed with those of his friend the earl of Surrey. He also translated David's Psalms into English verse. B. 1503; p. 1512.

WYATT, Sir Thomas, the Younger, was the son of the preceding, and in 1516, while serving with the army at Boulogne, was appointed by the earl of Surrey, the governor, a member of the council there, a post he is believed to have retained until the place was returned to the French, in 1550. Four years later he was appointed to the command of the Kentish men, in the insurrection of the duke of Suffolk; but after gaining some advantages over the royalists, he was taken prisoner in London. He was soon afterwards condemned to death as a rebel, n. about 1521; executed, 1554.

WYATT, James, an eminent English architect, who in his 14th year was taken to Rome by Lord Bagot, and there assiduously studied the remains of ancient architectural art. He next spent two years in Venice, and about 1767 returned to London, where he was employed to design the Pantheon in Oxford Street (since rebuilt); after which, according to Walpole, he became the "fashionable architect" of the day.

He planned the alterations at Salisbury and Lichfield cathedrals, designed Fonthill Abbey for Beckford, and built a castle at Kew for George III. In 1802 he was elected president of the Royal Academy in place of West, who was re-elected in the following year. One of his sons, Benjamin, became the architect of Drury Lane Theatre. s. at Burton Constable, Staffordshire, 1746; n. 1813.

WYATT, Richard J., an English sculptor, who studied his profession under Charles Rossi, R.A., under Bosio, at Paris, and finally received instructions from Canova, at Rome. He produced a large number of excellent works; and upon some of them being placed in the Great Exhibition of 1851, a medal for sculpture was awarded to the deceased sculptor. The Crystal Palace at Sydenham contains several casts from his works. b. in London, 1795; d. at Rome, 1850.

WYATT, Matthew Digby, an eminent English architect and writer upon art-subjects, who studied his profession in the office of his brother, and in 1844 made a tour through France, Italy, Sicily, and Germany; and, after his return to England, published "Specimens of the Geometrical Mosaics of the Middle Ages." In 1848 he was engaged to restore and redecorate the Adolphi Theatre (since taken down). After being engaged upon the press for some time, he was appointed by the Society of Arts a member of the commission to report upon the Paris expositions of industry. Subsequently he took an active part in the arrangements for the Great Exhibition of 1851, of which he acted as one of the royal commissioners. When it was decided to reconstruct the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, he, together with Mr. Owen Jones, was dispatched to collect works of art upon the continent. Under his direction were constructed the Byzantine, Mediæval, Renaissance, and Italian courts, &c., the handbooks of which he assisted in preparing. He was in 1856 appointed architect to the East India Company, for which he erected some considerable works. Among other valuable publications, he produced, "The Industrial Arts of the 19th Century," "Metal-work, and its Artistic Designs," and the articles "Renaissance" and "Italian Ornament," for Owen Jones's "Grammar of Ornament." He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. b. near Devizes, Wilts, 1820.

WYATVILLE (WYATT), Sir Jeffry, wi-at-vil, a celebrated English architect, who was designed for the naval service; but the Royal George, the ship in which he was to have embarked, having been lost at Spithead, he was placed in the office of his uncle, an architect in large practice in the metropolis. At the conclusion of his term of pupillage, he in 1799 joined in business with Mr. Armstrong, a large government contractor, and was thus placed in a position to obtain commissions from many noblemen and gentlemen in different parts of England. After designing some mansions, and a new front for Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, he was in 1824 commanded by George IV. to remodel Windsor Castle; upon which great work he was employed during the remainder of his life. At the completion of the private apartments of the castle, he received the honour of knighthood from his majesty, having previously added "ville" to his name by royal authority. Sir Jeffry also designed extensive alterations at Chatsworth, and erected buildings in Windsor Park, a temple at Kew, Ashridge, WYCHERLY, William, wich'er-le, an eminent English poet and dramatic writer. In his 15th year he was sent by his father to France, where he resided until a short time before the Restoration, in the interval embracing the Roman Catholic religion, which he afterwards renounced; but again abjured the Protestant faith, and returned to the Romish communion. In the reign of Charles II. he was distinguished by his wit and personal accomplishments, and was taken into the particular friendship of the duchess of Cleveland. About 1679 he married the countess of Drogheda, who, dying shortly afterwards, left him the whole of her fortune, which was, however, dissipated in extravagance, and in the law expenses consequent upon a suit relative to the deceased lady's will. He was thrown into prison for debt, whence he was released by James II., who gave him a pension. In his 80th year he was married to a young lady of fortune; but, although he survived the ceremony only eleven days, he managed to squander a large portion of his wife's money. Upon his death-bed he advised the lady "not to take an old man for her second husband." His comedies are, "Love in a Wood," "The Country Wife," "The Plain Dealer," and "The Gentleman Dancing Master." He likewise wrote some poems and "Moral Reflections," b. at Cleave, Shropshire, about 1640; d. 1715.

WYCLIFFE, WICLIF, or WICKLIFF, John de, wik'li-f, a celebrated English divine, styled the "morning star of the Reformation," was admitted first at Queen's, but afterwards removed to Merton College, Oxford. In 1361 his great talents procured him the mastership of Balliol College; and four years afterwards he was made warden of Canterbury Hall, then founded by Archbishop Islip, whose successor, Simon Langham, displaced him at the instigation of the monks, who were the sworn foes of Wycliffe, for exposing their corrupt errors and practices. In 1374 the pope having cited King Edward III. to Avignon for refusing to pay him a yearly tribute, Wycliffe was appointed a member of the legation sent to the conferences held thereupon at Bruges. About this time he was preferred by the king to the rectory of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire. Having now openly preached against the corruptions of the Roman church, Pope Gregory XI., being informed of his conduct, issued several bulls against him, charging him with numerous heresies. An assembly was accordingly held at St. Paul's by Courtney, bishop of London, to examine Wycliffe, who appeared, supported by John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and Lord Henry Percy. Wycliffe made an able defence of himself, and the council ended without any determination. It would appear that, still continuing to denounce papal corruption, he was in 1378 summoned before a synod held in the archbishop's palace at Lambeth; but his safety was secured by a message from the king's mother, ordering the proceedings to terminate. It is remarkable that, although Wycliffe continued his vehement attacks upon the temporal power of the pope, and also upon several vital points of Romish doctrine, he escaped the fate of those who professed "heresy." This immunity from the consequences of his bold conduct is supposed to have been owing to the secret protection of John of Gaunt; but, forty years after his death, his bones were taken up and burnt by order of the Council of Constance. He wrote, among other works, a tract on the Schism of the Popes; and also translated the New Testament into English. b. probably in Yorkshire, about 1324; d. at Lutterworth, Leicestershire, 1384.

WYKEHAM, William of, wik'-ham, an illustrious English prelate and architect, who owed his rise to Nicholas Uvedale, lord of the manor of Wykeham, and governor of Winchester, at whose expense he was educated, afterwards becoming his secretary. Edward III. appointed him surveyor of the royal buildings, and it was upon Wykeham's advice that monarch rebuilt Windsor Castle. In 1359 he was constituted chief warden and surveyor of the royal castles, and in 1363 warden and justiciary of the king's forests south of Trent; keeper of the privy seal in 1364: two years after, secretary to the king; and in 1367 he succeeded William de Edyngdon in the see of Winchester, and the same year was appointed lord high chancellor; in which office he continued till 1391. He repaired the palaces and houses belonging to his see at a great expense, was zealous in establishing discipline and reforming abuses, founded New College, Oxford, and Winchester school. b. at Wykeham, Hampshire, 1324; d. at South Waltham, 1404.

WYNDHAM, Sir William, wind'-ham, an eminent English statesman, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, went abroad, and upon his return was chosen to represent the county of Somerset in Parliament. In 1710 he was appointed secretary at war, and in 1713 chancellor of the exchequer. He was dismissed from his place on the accession of George I., and, falling under suspicion at the breaking out of the Jacobite rebellion in 1715, was committed to the Tower, but was never brought to trial. He was the most eloquent and pertinacious opponent of Sir Robert Walpole. b. in Somersetshire, 1637; d. 1740.

WYNN, John Huddleston, wyn, a miscellaneous writer, who followed the business of a printer in London for a time, then obtained a commission in the army, and eventually became an author by profession. His chief works are, "A General History of the British Empire in America," "A General History of Ireland," and "Fables for the Female Sex." b. 1743; d. 1788.

WINTOWN, Andrew. (See WINTOWN.)

WYON, William, wi'-on, an eminent English designer of medals and coins, who came of a family distinguished as die-sinkers and engravers. He acquired a knowledge of his profession from his father and uncle, both of whom were established in business as die-sinkers at Birmingham. After gaining the gold medal of the Society of Arts for a medal of Ceres, he, in 1816, repaired to the metropolis, obtaining, after a smart competition, the post of second engraver at the Mint, the chief engraver being his cousin Thomas Wyon; but his relative's death taking place soon afterwards, Pistrucci was appointed. Between this engraver and himself there arose some sharp differences, out of which a literary controversy sprang. Finally, the matter was compromised by Pistrucci retaining the chief engravership, whilst Wyon was appointed to receive half his salary. In 1838 he was elected a Royal Academician, being the first coin-engraver that had obtained such a distinction. Wyon's chief coins and medals were, a portion of the coins issued under the reign of George IV.; the whole of those produced under William IV.; all those of Queen Victoria, up to his death; medals for the Peninsula, Trafalgar, Jellalabad, and Cabul; for the Royal, Geographical, Geological, and other Societies, English and Continental; for the Royal Academy, the Art Union, &c. b. at Birmingham, 1795; d. at Brighton, 1851.—His son, Leonard Wyon, was his assistant during his lifetime, and, after his death, maintained the fame of the family. He produced, among other excellent works, the medals for the Great Exhibition of 1851.

XANTHUS, zân'-thus, an ancient Greek historian, who produced a work entitled "Lydiaca," written in the Ionic dialect, and containing a history of Lydia. Of this work, which was greatly praised by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, only some fragments remain, in quotations to be found in Strabo and others. Flourished about 430 B.C.

XANTIPPUS, zân'-tip'-pus, a Lacedæmonian general, who went to the support of the Carthaginians in 256 B.C., and defeated the Romans under Regulus at Tunes (now Tunis). Notwithstanding his services, the Carthaginians ordered the captain of his ship to throw him into the sea.

XAVIER, Francis, St., zâ'-ve-ai, a celebrated missionary of the Roman Catholic Church, who was descended from a noble family in Navarre, and, after entering into holy orders, joined Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the society of Jesuits. In 1541 he set out with some disciples to preach Christianity in the Portuguese colonies in Asia. In the following year he landed at Goa, where, as well as along the coast from Cape Comorin to the Isle of Manna, he obtained many thousand converts. He subsequently laboured at Malacca, in the island of Ceylon, whose king he converted, and in Japan, where he remained during nearly two years and a half. He was about to prosecute his mission in China, but died before he could find the means of landing secretly in that country. b. at the castle of Xavier, Navarre, 1506; d. at the island of Sancia, near Macao, 1552.

XENOCRATES, zen-ôk'-ru-tees, a Greek philosopher, who became a disciple of Plato, and during twenty-five years taught at Athens with such reputation that the judges dispensed with his oath when he appeared in court as a witness. He wrote a number of works, which have been lost. b. at Chalcædon, 396 B.C.; d. 314 B.C.

XENOPHANES, zen-ôf'-a-nees, a Greek philosopher and poet, whose doctrines were expressed in verse. According to Cicero, the foundation of his teaching was, "that all things are One, and this One is unchangeable, and it is God, unproduced and eternal." He likewise held that the moon was inhabited, and contained mountains and cities. He was the founder of the Eleatic school of philosophy, and is by some writers stated to have taught the system known as Pantheism. Flourished about 560 B.C.

early age became the disciple of Socrates, with whom he was a favourite. In 401 B.C. he joined the Greeks in the pay of Cyrus, and accompanied him in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, king of Persia. After the battle between the two brothers, at Cunaxa, near Babylon, in which Cyrus was slain, the Greeks found themselves in the heart of the Persian empire, and surrounded by enemies. Clearchus, the general-in-chief, was soon afterwards killed; whereupon the command devolved upon Xenophon, who immortalized himself by successfully conducting the famous retreat of the ten thousand Greeks from Cunaxa to Chrysopolis, opposite Byzantium. He afterwards assisted Seuthes, king of Thrace, to recover his kingdom, and next reconducted the Greeks into Asia, where they joined the Lacedæmonian general Timbron against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, and gained a large share of plunder. In 396 B.C. Xenophon attached himself to Agesilaus, king of Sparta, and was with him in his Asiatic expedition. According to Plutarch, he, after 394 B.C., settled at Scillus, near Olympia, where he resided for more than twenty years, and composed several of his works; finally he repaired to Corinth. Among other works of Xenophon which are extant, are the "Cyropædia," or "Life of Cyrus the Great;" the "Anabasis," containing the history of the expedition of Cyrus the Younger, and of the celebrated retreat of the ten thousand Greeks; the "Hellenica," a History of Greece, beginning where Thucydides ends; the "Memorabilia of Socrates;" the "Apology of Socrates;" the "Life of Agesilaus;" treatises upon Horsemanship, Hunting, the Republics of Sparta and Athens, and the "Symposium," or Banquet, one of his finest philosophical productions. His writings have been edited and translated by many eminent persons. The style in which the originals are composed is so chaste and elegant, that Xenophon has been termed the "Attic bee." A complete English translation, principally by the Rev. J. S. Watson, is included in the series entitled "Bohn's Classical Library." B. in Attica, about 444 B.C.; D. about 359 B.C.

XENOPHON OF EPHESUS, a Greek writer, who produced a romance entitled "Ephesiaca," by some critics held to be the oldest work of its kind in the Greek language. There is an English version of it by Rooke.

XERXES I., serk'-ses, the fifth king of Persia, succeeded his father Darius Hystaspes in 485 B.C., reconquered Egypt, and then turned his arms against Greece, with a force, military and naval, amounting to 2,650,000; the camp-followers numbered at least as many more; while the women, eunuchs, and beasts of burden could not be enumerated. He threw a bridge over the Hellespont, and advanced into Europe; but, at the pass of Thermopylæ, was encountered by Leonidas, who, with 300 Spartans, made a stand, and effected a prodigious slaughter of the Persians. (See LEONIDAS.) The Greeks, shortly afterwards, defeated the Persian fleet near Salamis (see THEMISTOCLES), on which Xerxes was obliged to return to his own country, leaving Mardonius in the command of the remnant of his army, which was beaten and dispersed in 479 B.C. Disgusted with the war, Xerxes abandoned himself to luxury, and was slain by Artabanus, the captain of his guards, 465 B.C.

XERXES II., king of Persia, was the son and successor of Artaxerxes, the son of Darius. By some he is stated to have reigned during one year, by others only two months, having been assassinated, 425 B.C., by his brother Sogdianus, who succeeded him.

XIMENES, Francis de Cisneros, he-mai'-nais, a celebrated Spanish prelate and statesman, who studied at Salamanca, and afterwards at Rome. Cardinal Gonzales made him his grand vicar, and Queen Isabella II. appointed him her confessor. In 1495 he was preferred to the archbishopric of Toledo, where he reformed abuses and instituted many excellent charities. Julius II. made him a cardinal in 1507, and, at the same time, he became minister of state, in which position he conducted himself with wisdom and integrity. He founded the university of Alcalá, where he caused to be printed the great Polyglot Bible of Alcalá. B. in Castile, 1437; D. 1517.

XYLANDER, William, ze-lan'-der, a learned German philologist, whose real name was Holzmann, which, according to the custom of his time, he changed into the Greek form of Xylander. He became professor of Greek at Heidelberg, and published editions of Strabo in Greek and Latin, of Dion Cassius, Marcus Aurelius, Plutarch, and others. B. at Augsburg, 1532; D. at Heidelberg, 1576.

XYPHILINUS, John, zif-i-li'-nus, a patriarch of Constantinople, who was commonly called John of Trebizond, from the place of his birth. He produced an oration upon the "Adoration of the Cross," and other works. B. at Trebizond, about 1005; D. at Constantinople, 1076.

XYPHILINUS, John, a Greek writer, and nephew of the preceding, who executed, at the command of the emperor Michael Duca, an abridgment of the history of Dion Cassius. Of this work there is in English a translation by Manning. It is valuable on account of the greater portion of the original having been lost. The abridgment closes with the death of Alexander Severus, 235. Xiphilinus flourished towards the close of the 11th century.

YN, Thomas, yal'-den, an English poet, who entered into orders, and, in 1707, took the degree of D.D. He obtained two livings in Hertfordshire, and was very intimate with Bishop Atterbury, on which account he was taken up, and his papers seized, when that prelate was sent to the Tower. He was, however, discharged soon afterwards. His poems are to be found in various collections of the British poets. B. at Exeter, 1671; D. 1736.

YARRELL, William, yâr'-rel, an eminent English naturalist, who was the son of a newspaper agent, and himself continued to follow the same business almost to the time of his death. He evinced a love for field sports at an early age, becoming the best shot and angler of his day. The habits and localities of British birds and fishes were also closely studied by him; and, when he had attained his 40th year, he commenced his valuable labours as a writer upon natural history. Having been appointed a fellow of the Linnean Society, he wrote for the "Transactions" of that body a number of papers upon birds and fishes of great importance. One of the earliest members of the Zoological Society, he enriched its "Journal" with many treatises upon British and foreign animals. In 1836 he published his "History of British Fishes," and in 1843 his "History of British Birds,"—two admirable works, illustrated with excellent wood-engravings. He was the most popular writer upon natural history since Bewick. b. in London, 1784; d. at Yarmouth, 1858.

YATES, Frederick Henry, yatts, a popular actor, made his first appearance on the stage in 1817, in a play entitled "The Actor of all Work," and in the succeeding year was engaged at Covent Garden, and afterwards performed in all descriptions of character, from tragedy to farce, his pathos and his humour being equally conspicuous. He was subsequently manager of the Adelphi Theatre, in which capacity his taste and judgment gave great satisfaction to the play-going public. d. 1842.—His son, Mr. Edmund Yates, made a respectable reputation as a writer of light literature, and contributor to newspapers and periodicals.

YEARSLEY, Anne, yeers'-le, a poetical and dramatic writer, was originally a milk-woman; but, with the assistance of Hannah More, a volume of her productions was published by subscription in 1785, the profits of which enabled her to open a circulating library at the Hot Wells. Her principal publications are, "Poems on various Subjects," "Earl Godwin," a tragedy, and "The Royal Captives," a romance. Lived between 1750 and 1830.

wig, Count, york, a Prussian field-marshal, descended from an English family which has settled in Pomerania. He entered on a military career in his 18th year, and, after serving in the Dutch armies in the East Indies, returned to his native country, and was nominated a captain. He distinguished himself under the duke of Saxe-Weimar in the campaign of 1806, and in the following year became major-general. 1. the Grand Army which invaded Russia in 1812, he commanded the Prussian corps; but after the disastrous retreat, he upon his own responsibility withdrew his forces from those of the French, and by the treaty of Tauroggen the Prussian army was declared neutral. In 1813 he attacked and defeated Murat at Dannekow, and afterwards gained a signal advantage over Bertrand at Wurtemberg. At the battle of Leipzig his skill and valour were conspicuous, and when the allied forces passed into French territory, Yorck exhibited high qualities as a commander at Montmirail and at Laon. Subsequently to the surrender of Paris, he was raised to the dignity of count and given the command of the Prussian army in Silesia. After Napoleon's return from Elba, he was nominated to a command, but was never actively engaged with the enemy. In 1821 he rose to the grade of field-marshal. b. at Königsberg, 1759; d. in Silesia, 1830.

YORK, House of, a celebrated English royal family, which played an important part in the annals of Great Britain. The first duke of York was Edmund Plantagenet, called also De Langley, fifth son of Edward III. His second son, Richard, earl of Cambridge, married Anne Mortimer, daughter of Roger, earl of March, and grand-daughter of Lionel, duke of Clarence, the third son of Edward III. Upon the line of this king's eldest son becoming extinct in 1399, by the death of Richard II., the issue of Anne Mortimer inherited the true representation of Edward III. The rival house of Lancaster was descended from John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and fourth son of Edward III. The house of York furnished three kings to the throne of England—Edward IV., Edward V., and Richard III. The house of Tudor, which supplanted it, was allied to it by the marriage of Henry Tudor, afterwards Henry VII., with Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV. in the struggle between the houses of York and Lancaster, the partisans of the former were distinguished by a white, and those of the latter by a red rose. Hence the title, "Wars of the

" (See HENRY VI., EDWARD IV.) The duke of York was afterwards borne by Edward IV., second son of Edward IV. This prince was murdered with his brother, Edward V., in 1483. The next duke was Henry Tudor, second son of Henry VII., who ascended the throne as Henry VIII. in 1509. The title was in 1604 conferred upon Charles Stuart, second son of James I., who became king as Charles I. in 1625. His second son, James, held the title of duke of York until his elevation to the throne as James II., in 1685. Ernest Augustus, fifth brother of George I., was raised to the dukedom of York and Albany in 1716. Edward Augustus, younger brother of George III., was the next duke. Frederick, younger brother of George IV., became duke of York and Albany in 1784, and died childless in 1837.

YORK, Frederick, Duke of, second son of George III., was when only a few months old elected Prince-bishop of Osnaburg, in Germany. In 1780 he was appointed a brevet-colonel in the British army, and went to the Continent in order to study military tactics under Frederick the Great, at Berlin. In 1784 he was created duke of York and Albany; returned from the Continent in 1787; took his seat in the House of Lords in the same year; and, in 1789, fought a duel, which had nearly proved fatal to him, with Colonel Lennox, afterwards duke of Richmond. In 1791 he married the eldest daughter of the king of Prussia; was placed at the head of the British army in Flanders, in 1793; and, after alternate success, was driven out of that country by the French. In 1798, when employed in Holland, he was equally unfortunate, being under the necessity of signing a disadvantageous convention. In 1809 great scandal was caused by the allegation that he had permitted a female favourite, named Mary Anne Clarke, to influence him in the disposal of commissions in the army; but on an investigation taking place, he was acquitted. He, however, resigned the post of commander-in-chief, in which he was reinstated about two years afterwards by the Prince-regent. His royal highness was most attentive to the rights and comforts of the soldier, and while he enforced the necessity of strict discipline and subordination, gained the title of the Soldier's Friend. He was frank, affable, and benevolent in his disposition; but his character was unsavourily marred by an inveterate passion for gambling. He resolutely opposed the Roman catholic Emancipation Bill. b. 1763; d. 1827.

YORKE, Philip, (See HARDWICKE, Earl of.)

YORKE, Charles, an eminent English lawyer, the son of Lord Hardwicke, and after studying at Cambridge, entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and became, in succession, solicitor-general and attorney-general. In 1770 he was nominated lord-privy-seal, and was about to be raised to the peerage when his death took place.

Young

He wrote "Some Considerations on the Law of Forfeiture for High Treason." a. 1722; p. 1770.

YOUNG, Sir Peter, young, a Scotch diplomatist and writer, who was, with Buchanan, tutor to the young Scottish prince, afterwards James I. of England. In 1586 he was sent upon an embassy to the king of Denmark, to negotiate for the possession of the Orkney Islands. He wrote a vindication of Mary Queen of Scots. He was knighted in England, in 1614. a. in Forfarshire, 1544; p. in Scotland, 1623.

YOUNG, Patrick, a learned Scotch writer, and son of the preceding, became keeper of the king's library at St. James's, and assisted in making a Latin translation of the works of James I. He published St. Clement's Epistle to the Romans, Greek and Latin, 1637; and was engaged to print the Septuagint, after the Alexandrian MS. given to Charles I. by Cyril Lucar, but did not execute it. a. in East Lothian, 1584; p. in Essex, 1652.

YOUNG, Edward, an English divine and poet, who was educated at Winchester school and All Souls' College, Oxford, where he studied the civil law, after which he made the acquaintance of the duke of Wharton, who settled upon him an annuity for life. In 1727 he turned his thoughts to divinity; was ordained, made chaplain to the king, and presented to the living of Welwyn, in Hertfordshire. As a poet, he excels most in his "Night Thoughts," which abound with ornate images, but are often very obscure. Besides this work, he wrote "The Revenge" and "The Brothers," tragedies; "The Centaur not Fabulous," a moral satire; "Estimate of Human Life," a sermon; "Conjectures on Original Composition;" "The Love of Fame the Universal Passion;" some papers in the "Spectator;" and miscellaneous poems. a. at Upham, Hampshire, 1684; p. at Welwyn, Hertfordshire, 1765.

YOUNG, Matthew, an eminent Irish prelate and mathematician, who became fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, doctor of divinity, professor of natural philosophy in the Irish university, and, finally, bishop of Clonfert. His most important works were, "Essay on the Philosophy of Sounds and Musical Strings;" "Principles of Natural Philosophy;" and a number of valuable papers upon mathematics and philosophy, inserted in the "Transactions" of the Royal Irish Academy, of which learned body he was one of the chief founders. a. in county Roscommon, Ireland, 1750; p. in 1800.

YOUNG, Arthur, an eminent English writer upon agriculture, was the son of the Rev. Dr. Young, prebendary of Canterbury and chaplain to the speaker of the House of Commons. It being intended that he should become a merchant, he was apprenticed to a firm at Lynn; but the young man having no taste for mercantile pursuits, his time was chiefly spent in reading; and, after the death of his father, he started a periodical called the "Universal Museum," but discontinued it at the sixth number. He next devoted himself to the management of a small farm belonging to his mother, and in 1765 commenced writing upon agriculture. Two years later he entered upon the management of a larger farm, and, in consequence of the experiments he carried out therein, was enabled to produce, in 1770, his "Course of Experimental Agriculture," one of the first works of any importance upon the subject of agriculture published in England. Henceforth, devoting himself with great energy to the cause of agricultural improvements, he proceeded to make tours of observation through England, publishing his experience in works which were read and translated in France, Russia, and other continental countries, almost immediately after their appearance in England. He likewise travelled through France, and produced an "Agricultural Survey" of that country, which materially contributed to the improvement of the arts of husbandry there. About 1783 he bought 4400 acres of waste land in Yorkshire, for the purpose of carrying out his schemes for the improvement of uncultivated soil. He also became secretary of the Board of Agriculture. In addition to the acknowledgment his services received from various agricultural societies in the United Kingdom, he was presented by Count Rostopchin, governor of Moscow, with a diamond snuff-box, with the motto, "From a pupil to his master." His principal works were, "Six Weeks' Tour through the Southern Counties of England;" "Tour through the Northern Counties;" "Political Arithmetic;" "The Annals of Agriculture," of which he published 45 volumes; and some political pamphlets. In 1801 the French Directory ordered a French translation of all his agricultural works to be made. This work was produced in Paris, under the title of "Le Cultivateur Anglais." a. 1741; p. 1820.—In 1805 his son went out, at the request of the Russian government, to make a survey of Moscow and its environs, for which duty he was rewarded with a large sum. He afterwards bought a fine estate in the Crimea, and took up his residence there.

YOUNG, Thomas, an eminent English philosopher, who was born of Quaker parents, and was himself educated in that form of religious belief, but abandoned it, after settling in London as a student of medicine under his uncle, an eminent physician. He next studied at several of the German universities, and took his degree as doctor of medicine at Göttingen; but his uncle having left him £10,000, he did not actively pursue his profession. He subsequently became professor of natural philosophy at the Royal Institution, physician of St. George's Hospital, secretary to the Board of Longitude, and, finally, conductor of the "Nautical Almanac." He was the discoverer of the principle of interferences in the undulating theory of light, and, among other valuable works, produced "A Course of Lectures on Natural Philosophy and Mechanical Arts," and sixty-three articles for the "Encyclopædia Britannica." a. at Milverton, Somersetshire, 1773; p. 1829.

YOUNG, Brigham, the president and prophet of the Mormons, of whose early life nothing that is authentic has been published. At the time of the murder of Joseph Smith, whose friend and colleague he was, Young was chosen by the Mormons as "prophet and revelator." He soon proved himself equal to the position. Foreseeing the utter hopelessness of contending against the people of Illinois, backed, perhaps, by the government of the United States, he besought his followers to quit Nauvoo, and proceed far beyond the most outlying settlement of the federal government. Resolved to place an almost impassable barrier between the "saints" and their persecutors, he selected a vast sterile tract, beyond the Rocky Mountains, called the Valley of the Great Salt Lake. Accordingly, pioneers were sent to that region to prepare the country for the settlement of their brethren. This small band underwent the greatest sufferings; but they nevertheless succeeded in planting crops, and in otherwise making the territory habitable. The great body of the "Mormonites" then followed. Brigham Young was nominated governor, with the whole civil and ecclesiastical authority vested in him. Feeling that, in order to firmly establish the theocratic system his predecessor had in view (see SMITH, Joseph), Young, after organizing his plans for the settlement of the community, endeavoured, as much as possible, to keep out "Gentile" intruders; but the discovery of the gold-fields in California caused such a vast stream of emigrants to pass Utah, on their way to or from the auriferous region, that the "saints" were compelled to open an intercourse with the travellers. This traffic, which was at the outset a source of the greatest vexation and uneasiness to the leaders of the Mormon community, ultimately led to the greatly-increased prosperity of the settlement. Under the presidency of Buchanan, troops were dispatched to Utah, to enforce the authority of the federal officers placed there; but the affair was subsequently compromised, by Young and his followers professing their loyalty to the United States government. Mormonism, after the advent of Brigham Young's supremacy, became materially altered from what it was in the time of Joseph Smith. It would appear that the "prophet" claimed the power of granting or withholding eternal life; that he strictly enjoined blind obedience to the dictates of himself and his "elders;" that, finally, the constant theme of his exhortations was, "Do your duty, and leave us to do ours; cleave to the truth, and let the brethren come and pay their labour tithings."

mands of Joseph Smith; and declares that no man has a "right to a wife or wives, unless he honours the priesthood." In 1837 the population of Utah was computed at 80,000, 60,000 were "saints." Brigham Young born in the United States, 1801.

YPSILANTI, Prince Alexander, ep'-sil-an'-te, the first active agent in the revolution which resulted in the establishment of the independence of Greece, was son of Demetrius, Hospodar of Wallachia. About 1805, Ypsilanti's father received a summons from the grand seignor to repair to Constantinople, and fearing that obedience to the command might cost him his life, he retired to Russia. The son entered the Russian army; and was a captain of hussars when a ball, at the battle of Dresden, carried away his right hand. He ultimately attained the rank of major-general, and was made aide-de-camp to the emperor. In 1820 he became connected with the Hetaïra, of which association he eventually became the leader. When the breaking out of the insurrection in Greece became inevitable, he resolved to plant in Moldavia the standard of revolt. He crossed the Pruth with a few attendants, and in March, 1821, issued a proclamation, announcing that Greece had kindled the torch of freedom, and thrown off the tyranny of Turkey; on which his name was struck off the rolls of the Russian army. After sustaining repeated defeats, Ypsilanti, in despair, gave up the cause of Greece, which, however, was successful a few years later. Having crossed the frontiers, he was arrested in Transylvania, and long held captive in the fortress of Mungatsch. Though courageous and sincere, Ypsilanti's pride and love of ceremony unfitted him for the post of leader in a patriotic struggle. b. 1792; d. 1828.

YRIARTE, Juan de, e-re-ar'-tai, a Spanish writer, who became librarian to the king, member of the Academy, and interpreter to the secretary of state. He wrote poems in Latin and Spanish; a Latin Grammar in verse; catalogue of Greek MSS. in the royal library; and another of Arabic MSS. in the Escorial. b. 1702; d. at Madrid, 1771.

YSAURE, or ISAURE, Clemence, e-so'-rai, a lady of Toulouse, who in the fourteenth century instituted the Floral games, which were annually solemnized therein in the month of May; for which she also provided a fund for prizes to be given to the successful candidates for poetical

Yussef, although Morocco was his capital, paid many visits to his Spanish dominions, and, on the last occasion, appointed his youngest son Ali his successor, in a council of governors held at Cordova; and then returned to Morocco, where he died at a very advanced age in 1106 A.D., or 500 of the Hegira, after having reigned for forty years. The dynasty of the Almoravides expired with Ishak Ibrahim Taxfyn, Yussef's grandson, who devoted himself entirely to pleasure, and allowed his subjects to be harassed and oppressed with exorbitant taxes, which excited a rebellion. A revolution was effected, Ibrahim was compelled to flee from his dominions, and being hard pressed by his pursuers, leaped his horse over a precipice, and was dashed to atoms along with his favourite wife. The government then, in the 25th year of Ibrahim's reign, passed to the Almohades.

ZABARELLA, Francis, za'-ba-rail'-la, a celebrated Italian cardinal, who became a famous professor of the canon law in different universities, and was honoured with the cardinalship by Pope John XXIII., who sent him upon an embassy to the emperor Sigismund. He assisted at the Council of Constance, where he advised the deposing of the pope, in hopes of succeeding him. He wrote a "Treatise on Schism," and other works. B. at Padua, 1339 D. at Constance, 1417.

ZABARELLA, James, a learned Italian commentator, of the same family as the preceding, was profoundly acquainted with the Aristotelian system of philosophy, and became professor at his native place. He wrote "Commentaries on Aristotle," and other works. B. at Padua, 1533; D. 1559.

ZACH, Francis Xavier, Baron von, zak, an eminent Hungarian astronomer, who, after completing his education in Austria, repaired to London, where he resided during several years, becoming intimately acquainted with the language and institutions of England. In 1786 he was appointed by the duke of Saxe-Gotha director of the new observatory at Seeberg. He afterwards went to reside in France, and, having repaired to Paris for the purpose of undergoing a surgical operation, was carried off by cholera, which at the time was raging there. Baron von Zach won a European reputation by his numerous astronomical labours, was a member of the Royal Astronomical Society of England, and other different learned bodies, English and continental. B. at Pesth, 1754; D. 1832.

ZACHARIAS, zák'-a-ri'-as, a pope, who was a native of Greece, succeeded Gregory III. in 741. He succeeded in making peace between the duchy of Rome and Luitprand, king of the Longobards, and gained from that monarch the restitution of more territory than had been taken from the Roman duchy. He released the chief men of France from their allegiance to King Childeric III., and approved of the elevation of Pepin to the throne. D. 752.

ZACUTUS, za'-ku'-tus, an eminent Jewish physician of Portugal, who retired to Amsterdam when Philip IV. issued an edict against the Jews. His medical works exhibit profound learning. D. at Amsterdam, 1641.—His grandson distinguished himself by his skill in mathematics, and was the author of a book called "Juchasin," a Jewish chronology, from the Creation to the year 1800.

ZALEVUS, za'-le'-vus, a famous legislator among the Epizephyrian Locrians, a people of Italy. One of his laws was, that every citizen should enter the senate unarmed; but having inadvertently appeared there himself in armour, he, to satisfy the law, fell upon his own sword. Supposed to have flourished about 650 B.C.

ZAMOYSKI, John Sarius, za'-mo-ees'-ski, a Polish patriot, the son of Stanislaus, castellan of Skokow, in the palatinate of Culm. Sent to Paris, and afterwards to Padua, he acquired so high a reputation as to obtain the rectorship of the latter university. It was while holding this office that he wrote his treatises on the Roman Senate and the Perfect Senator. On his return to Poland he was employed in the highest offices of the state. King Stephen Bathori gave him his niece in marriage, made him grand chancellor of the kingdom, and afterwards general of his armies. He distinguished himself as a military commander and statesman, by delivering a great part of the Polish dominions from the yoke of Muscovy. On the death of Stephen Bathori, the Polish nobles offered him the crown, which he refused, and caused Sigismund, Prince of Sweden, to be elected as Sigismund III. He established a printing-press at the town of Nowy Zamose, which he founded; was an elegant writer, and was universally regarded as the defender of his country's liberties. B. 1541; D. 1605.

ZANCHI, Jerome, zan'-ke, a learned Italian reformer, who had entered among the canons regular of Lateran, but becoming intimate with Peter Martyr, he embraced Lutheranism, and quitted Italy. He afterwards became professor of divinity at Heidelberg. B. at Alzano, Bergamo, 1516; D. at Heidelberg, 1590. He was a man of considerable learning, piety, and moderation. His works, consisting of theological and controversial treatises, were published at Geneva in 1619.

ZANOTTI, Francis Maria, za-not'-te, an eminent Italian philosopher, who was in early life educated among the Jesuits, after which he studied the law, which, however, he renounced, and applied to the mathematics under Beccari. In 1716 he was appointed secretary to the senate of Bologna, and two years afterwards, professor of mathematics in that university, wherein he introduced the Newtonian system instead of the Cartesian. He was appointed librarian of the Institute, and compiled two catalogues of its library. In 1766 he became president of the Institute. Several poetical and philosophical works emanated from him. B. at Bologna, 1692; D. 1777.

ZANOTTI, John Peter, an eminent Italian painter and poet, who was brother of the preceding. B. 1674; D. at Bologna, 1765.

ZARATE, Augustin de, tha-ra'-at, a Spanish historian, who in 1543 was sent to Peru as treasurer-general of the Indies, and on his return to Europe was employed in the Low Countries. He wrote a "History of the Discovery and Conquest of Peru," published at Antwerp in 1555. B. at Logrono, Old Castile, about 1500; D. 1558.

ZARCO, John Gonzales, zar'-ko, a Portuguese navigator of the 15th century, who discovered the islands of Porto Santo and Madeira; and was made governor of a part of the latter island, where he founded Funchal.

ZARLINO, Joseph, zar-le'-no, a celebrated Italian writer upon music, who in early life was chorister at St. Mark's, Venice, and appears to have been of the ecclesiastical profession. He became organist of St. Mark's, and director of music there. He was the most voluminous writer upon music which his country has produced. B. at Chioggia, in the states of Venice, 1519; D. about 1599.

ZEDIN, Stephen, zeg'-e-din, a Lutheran divine, who propagated the Protestant religion with great zeal in Hungary, for which he was persecuted. His works are, "A Commentary on the Scriptures," "A Defence of the Trinity," &c. B. in Hungary, 1505; D. 1572.

ZELOTTI, Battista, ze-lot'-te, an Italian painter, who was the disciple of Titian, and was distinguished for the beauty of his colouring and the elegance of his design. B. at Verona, 1532; D. 1593.

THE DICTIONARY

Zeno

ZENO of Elea, ze'-no, a Greek philosopher, and a follower of the Eleatic sect, studied under Parmenides, and accompanied that philosopher to Athens about 454 B.C. According to Aristotle, he was the first who employed dialectics. An ardent patriot, he endeavoured to deliver his country from the sway of a tyrant; but the conspiracy in which he was engaged having been discovered, he was put to death in a barbarous manner. He was the author of several philosophical works, none of which have survived. Aristotle has, however, preserved the arguments which Zeno held against the existence of absolute motion. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

ZENO of Citium, the founder of the sect of Stoics, so called from his opening a school in the painted colonnade (Stoa) at Athens, where he taught logic, grammar, logic, and rhetoric. His system, which continued for four centuries, held that to live according to nature should be the aim of man; that the really wise man, having everything in himself, is beyond the power of those things which enslave the rest of mankind. The Stoic might feel pain, but could not be conquered by it. Unlike the Epicureans, the Stoics sought wisdom and temperance; and differed from the Sceptics, inasmuch as they were always seeking for the truth, which had been denied by the former. His successors carried his philosophy to Rome, where it was embraced by the most illustrious persons. Zeno taught at Athens for upwards of fifty years. B. in the island of Cyprus, about B.C. 355; D. about B.C. 260.

ZENO, called the Isaurian, emperor of the East, married the daughter of Leo I. in 453, and succeeded him in conjunction with his own son Leo II. in 474. He was driven from his throne by Basiliscus in 475; but the year following he recovered it. D. 491.

ZENO, Charles, grand admiral of Venice, who commanded the fleets of that republic against the Genoese, whom he defeated in 1390. He was subsequently ambassador at the courts of England and France, and was appointed to command the forces of Venice in the war with Francis of Carrara; but having been suspected of receiving bribes from that prince, he was thrown into prison, where he remained during two years. He next made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and on his return voyage defeated the Genoese for Lusignan, king of Cyprus. After regaining his native country, he devoted himself to literary studies. B. about 1334; D. 1418.

ZENO, Nicholas and Antonio, were two Venetian travellers, and brothers of the preceding. Nicholas is stated to have equipped a vessel, on board of which he, about 1380, set sail for England and Flanders; but having been driven out of his track by a storm, was shipwrecked upon the "island of Friesland." He entered the service of Zichmni, prince of that country, and was loaded with wealth and honours for his warlike services. His brother Antonio joined him in 1391, and after the death of Nicholas in 1395, he was advanced by Zichmni to the high posts held by his brother. Antonio remained in the service of Zichmni during fourteen years. While so engaged, he took part in many warlike expeditions and voyages of discovery. It has been assumed by geographers that the countries visited and described by Antonio and Nicholas Zeno were the easterly portions of the Danish peninsula and the islands north of Scotland, and Iceland. The "Narrative" of these adventures, accompanied by charts, &c., was printed from the manuscripts of the brothers by Marcolini, in 1558. Antonio is supposed to have died in 1403, shortly after his return to Venice.—Several other members of this famous Venetian family became distinguished as scholars, statesmen, and travellers.

ZENO, Apostolo, the father of the Italian opera, who was a descendant of the Zeno family, became court poet and historiographer to the emperor Charles VI., and commenced in 1710, the celebrated periodical work called "Il Giornale dei Letterati." He wrote, among other works, "Observations on the Italian Historians." His dramatic works were printed in 1744, in 10 vols. B. at Venice, 1683; D. 1750.

ZENO, Pietro Caterino, an eminent Venetian writer, who was elder brother of the preceding, became a monk in his 22nd year, and after being employed during several years in teaching rhetoric in an educational establishment belonging to his monastery, was appointed professor of philosophy at Venice. Upon his brother receiving the post of court poet and historiographer to the emperor Charles VI., Pietro succeeded to the post of editor of "Il Giornale dei Letterati," and retained it until the year 1728. He wrote the lives of several of the most distinguished Venetian historians, executed an Italian translation of Arnauld's Logic, and the sermons of Bourdaloue. He likewise produced some critical essays upon poetry. B. at Venice, 1606; D. at the same city, 1732.

ZENOBIA, ze-no'-bi-a, a queen of Palmyra, was the wife of Odenatus, a Syrian prince, who having gained several victories over the Persians, was, by Gallienus, associated in the government of the Roman empire. After the death of Odenatus, Zenobia conquered Egypt, and maintained herself as a potentate, independent of Rome, till the emperor Aurelian marched against her, and laid siege to Palmyra. Being taken, as she attempted to make her escape, she was conducted to Rome in triumph, and is supposed to have died near that city, subsequently to 270.

ZEXONORUS, zen'-o-no'-rus, a Greek sculptor, who at first pursued his profession in Gaul, where he carved a statue of Mercury. He was invited to Rome to execute a colossal bronze statue of Nero, which is stated by Pliny to have been 120 feet high. He also excelled in small works in silver. Lived in the first century.

ZEPHYRINUS, zef-i'-ri-nus, bishop of Rome in the reign of the emperor Septimius Severus, was the successor of Victor I. in 202. He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom about 219. His successor was Calixtus I.

ZEUXIS, zeu'-is, of Heraclea, a celebrated Greek painter, who studied his art under Apollodorus, whom he excelled. He was the rival of Parrhasius. Grandeur of subject, noble drawing, and the most exquisite beauty in the female figures, distinguished the works of Zeuxis. Pliny relates his dispute with Parrhasius for the prize of painting, as follows:—Zeuxis painted some grapes so naturally, that the birds used to peck at them; whilst Parrhasius represented a curtain so artfully, that Zeuxis ordered it to be drawn aside, that he might see the painting behind it. Discovering his mistake, he confessed himself outdone, since he had only imposed upon birds, whereas Parrhasius had deceived those who were judges of the art. His greatest

What winning graces! What majestic mien!
She moves a goddess, and she looks a queen."
b. about 450; d. about 375 b.c.

ZHUKOVSKY, Vasilii Andreovich, zhoo-kof'-lee, a celebrated Russian poet, who was devoted to verse-making from his earliest years, and in 1802 became a popular writer in consequence of the success attained by his translation of Gray's "Elegy." During the campaign of 1812 he served as lieutenant of the Moscow Volunteers, producing, at the same time, a series of spirit-stirring songs, entitled "The Minstrel in the Russian Camp," which were sung throughout the Russian army. Besides a large number of beautiful original lyrics, he produced translations from the German poets, and from Byron, Dryden, and Moore. b. near Bielev, 1783; d. at Baden, 1852.

ZIEGLER, James, tsé'-gler, an eminent mathematician and divine of Saabia, who produced, among other works, "Notes on Particular Passages of Scripture," "Description of the Holy Land," and a treatise upon the construction of the solid sphere. d. 1540.

ZIEGLER, Gaspar, an eminent German juriconsult, who became professor of law at Wittenberg. His principal works are, "De Milite Episcopo," "De Diaconis et de Diaconessis," "De Episcopis." d. at Leipsic, 1690.

ZISTEN, John Joachim von, tsé'-ten, a Prussian general, who, at an early age, entered the army, and soon distinguished himself by his courage. Having challenged his captain, he lost his commission; but was afterwards reinstated, and obtained the command of a squadron of hussars, which, under his control, became extremely formidable. He distinguished himself greatly in the campaign of 1745; but, by the intrigues of General Von Winterfeldt, he lost the favour of the king till the commencement of the Seven Years' War, when he was appointed lieutenant-general. He rendered eminent services at the battle of Prague, and in many others; particularly the storming of the heights of Torgau. After the termination of that war he led a retired life, greatly esteemed by his sovereign, and by the whole nation. b. near Berlin, 1699; d. 1786.

ZIMMERMANN, tsim'-mer-man, Matthias, a German Protestant divine, who became minister at Meissen, and wrote, among other works, "Amicitias Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ," "Florilegium Philologico-Historicum." b. 1626; d. at Meissen, 1689.

ZIMMERMANN, John George, a celebrated Swiss physician and philosopher, who studied at Göttingen under Haller, and afterwards attended lectures in Holland and Paris. On his return to his native place, he applied himself principally to literature, but without neglecting his profession. His writings commended him to the friendship of the highest personages in Germany, and, in 1763, he was appointed physician to his Britannic majesty in Hanover. In 1786 he was summoned to Potsdam, to attend Frederick the Great in his last illness. His works principally are, a poem on the Earthquake at Lisbon, 1755; a physiological dissertation on Irritability; an essay on Solitude, which has been translated into French and English; an essay on National Pride. b. at Brugg, Bern, 1728; d. in Hanover, 1795.

ZIMMERMANN, Eberhard Augustus William von, a German naturalist, studied at Göttingen and Leyden; and obtained the professorship of natural philosophy at the Caroline College at Brunswick. His first work was a treatise on the "Analysis of Curves;" and in 1777 he published "Specimen Zoologicæ," being the outline of his "Geographical History of Man and Quadrupeds." He visited England three times, and there published, in 1787, his "Political Survey of the Present State of Europe;" and subsequently wrote against the revolutionary statesmen of France; for which he was ennobled by the emperor Leopold II. After this he published several geographical works, among which was a "General Survey of France and the United States of America." b. 1743; d. 1815.

ZINZENDORF, Nicholas Louis, Count von, tsin'-tsen-dorf, a Saxon nobleman, who rendered himself remarkable as the founder, or rather reviver, of the religious society commonly called, in England, Moravians, upon the European continent, Herrnhuters, and by themselves, the United Brethren. They settled first in Upper Lusatia, in 1722; and becoming considerable, formed a village called Herrnhut, in 1732; but were subsequently driven from it. A few years afterwards the count repaired to England, and there established a Moravian congregation. He afterwards founded congregations of the sect in Switzerland and the British colonies of North America. He succeeded in obtaining permission from the Saxon government for the return of the United Brethren to Herrnhut, about 1747. The government of the United Brethren is episcopal, their doctrine sound, and their manners irreproachable; but what renders them particularly deserving of respect is, the pains which they have successfully taken for the propagation of the gospel in heathen countries. Count Zinzendorf was succeeded in the government of the Brethren by Count Dohna. b. in Saxony, 1700; d. at Herrnhut, 1780.

ZISKA, or ZISKA, John, tsis'-ka, a celebrated Bohemian nobleman, who became the leader of the Hussites. In early life he acted as one of the pages of Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia and emperor of Germany. He afterwards served with the English in their wars with France; commanded a Bohemian and Moravian corps at the battle of Tannenberg, in 1410, where 40,000 Teutonic knights and soldiers were slain. In 1415 he distinguished himself at the battle of Agincourt, where he fought under the English colours. Embracing soon afterwards the doctrines of John Huss, he, upon the death of that reformer, resolved to take up arms in defence of the religious liberties of the Bohemians. In 1419 a quarrel burst forth at Prague between the Roman Catholics and Hussites, the result of which was the proclamation of the Hussite war. This awful conflict raged during sixteen years, in five of which Ziska held the command. At the head of his terrible army he won thirteen pitched battles, and was victorious in upwards of one hundred sieges and engagements. But his great military attainments were allied to the most awful cruelty. It must be admitted, that he always regarded himself as an instrument of the divine vengeance upon the corrupt monks and priests. His sister had been seduced by a monk; and whenever he heard the lamentations of a Roman Catholic priest, burning at the stake, he would cry, "It is the bridal song of my sister." While young he had lost an eye, and in 1421 was bereft of the sight of the other at the siege of Raby; but he still continued to oppose the emperor Sigismund, who sent ambassadors to offer him the government of Bohemia. Amidst these negotiations, Ziska died of the plague in 1424. The story of his ordering his skin to be made into a drum to animate his followers, is a fable. b. in Bohemia, about 1300, or, according to some, 1380.

ZOBEL, Benjamin, tsö'-bel, a German artist, who, in 1783, repaired to England, where he afterwards received the appointment of "table-decker" to George III. at Windsor Castle. It was his duty to form, upon a silver plateau occupying the entire centre of the royal dining-table, a series of designs of fruits, flowers, and arabesque-work, by means of various-coloured sands. Zobel afterwards invented a plan of rendering these designs fixed. He also excelled in painting upon gold and silver grounds. b. at Meiningen, Bavaria, 1782; d. 1831.

ZOE, zo'-e, empress of the East, was at first the mistress, but afterwards became the wife, of the emperor Leo VI., and mother of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, during whose minority she governed the empire, in conjunction with her lover Romanus I. Constantine, when he came of age, sent her into exile, where she died 919. —There was another of this name, who was daughter of Constantine XI., and wife of Argyrus, whom she murdered, and married Michael the Paphlagonian. She died in 1052.

ZOEGA, George, zoo'-ga, an eminent Danish archaeologist, who studied at Göttingen under Heyne; and, having attracted the notice of the Danish minister Goldburg, was in 1782 appointed to proceed upon a numismatic tour in Germany, Italy, and France. After marrying a beautiful Italian lady, he embraced Roman Catholicism, and took up his residence at Rome. He produced a number of valuable works, the most important of which were, "A Treatise on Obelisks," "A Catalogue of the Coptic Manuscripts in the Library of Cardinal Borgia," "An Account of the Antique Bas-reliefs at Rome," the drawings for which were made by the celebrated Piranesi; and "Dissertation upon Ancient Art." b. in Denmark, 1755; d. at Rome, 1809.

ZOFFANY, John, tsöf'-fa-ne, a German artist, who, about 1764, went to England, and, attracting notice as a portrait-painter, was employed by some of the most distinguished persons of the day. Upon the foundation of the Royal Academy, he was in 1768 elected a member. He painted the portraits of George III. and his queen; thirty-six portraits of the Royal Academicians, introduced into a picture entitled "The Life School;" and Sir Joshua Reynolds. In theatrical portraits he was also excellent. The best known of these last are Garrick as Abel Druggier, in "The Alchemist," and Foote as Sturgeon, in "The Mayor of Garret." He spent some time in the East Indies, and there executed some paintings illustrative of Eastern life. b. 1735; d. at Kew, 1810.

ZOTUS, zo'-i-lus, a Greek rhetorician, who criticised the "Iliad" with such virulence as to be called "the rhetorical dog;" and caused his name to be applied to all snarling epics. Flourished about 270 B.C.

ZU, George Joachim, tsöf'-li-ko'-fer, 1116

an eminent Swiss Protestant divine, who was educated at Bremen and Utrecht. After officiating in the Pays de Vaud, he obtained a settlement at Monstein, in the Grisons, whence he removed to Isenburg, and in 1758 to Leipsic. He wrote, among other eloquent works, a book of Devotions, and two volumes of sermons.

ZONARAS, Joannes, zo-na'-ras, a Greek historian, who was employed in state affairs at the court of Constantinople, but afterwards turned monk. He compiled a "Chronicle or Annals from the Creation to 1118 A.D." This work was subsequently continued by Acominatus Nicetus. Zonaras was also the author of "Commentaries on the Apostolic Canons." Flourished in the 12th century.

ZOPYRUS, zop'-i-rus, one of the courtiers of Darius Hystaspes. He cut off his nose and ears at the siege of Babylon, and went over to the enemy, pretending that Darius had exercised this cruelty upon him. The Babylonians, hoping that Zopyrus would be stimulated by revenge, gave him the command of their army, which he treacherously betrayed to Darius.

ZOROASTER, or ZERDUSHT, zor'-o-üs'-ter, a celebrated Persian, and the founder of the religion of the Parsees, or "fire-worshippers," is supposed to have lived in the reign of Darius Hystaspes. He has been by some called the founder, and by others the reformer of the Magian religion. He taught that nothing could render men unworthy of the divine favour but vice. Of all virtues, he esteemed philanthropy the most; for which reason he exhorted his followers to acts of benevolence. He gave his disciples a form of devotion, which they affirmed was brought from heaven. The Magi, or priests, were of three ranks, over whom was an archimagus, which office he assumed himself. b. about 559 B.C.; d. 513 B.C.

ZOSIMUS, zos'-i-mus, a Greek historian, who wrote the "History of the Emperors" from Augustus to the second siege of Rome by Alaric, in 409. This work is still extant, and was printed at Oxford in 1679. Zosimus therein declaims with great asperity against the Christians. Lived in the early part of the 5th century.

ZOUCH, Richard, zoock, an eminent English writer upon jurisprudence, who became an advocate in Doctors' Commons; in 1620 regius professor of law at Oxford, and subsequently chancellor of the diocese of Oxford, principal of Alban Hall, and judge of the high court of Admiralty. He wrote some books on jurisprudence in Latin; and "Cases and Questions Resolved in the Civil Law;" but his principal work is a "Vindication of the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England against Sir Edward Coke." b. in Wiltshire, about 1590; d. in London, 1681.

ZUCHT, Gerard, zoock, a German portrait-painter, who fixed his residence in where he became the rival of Sir Peter Lely. He was celebrated for his portraits of men. b. 1637; d. 1681.

ZSCHOKKE, John Henry Daniel, zhok'-ke(r), a popular German writer, who took up his residence in Switzerland, where he was successively employed as the head of an educational establishment, governor of Bale, and, after the federal union of Switzerland in 1803, member of the council of Forests and Mines. He was a voluminous and versatile writer, his principal works being, "Historical Memoirs of the Swiss Revolution;" "History of Switzerland for the Swiss People;" several novels, which have been translated into English; and his "Autobiography," which has also appeared in an English version. b. in Prussia, 1771; d. at Biberstein, 1848.

Zuccarelli

ZUCCARELLI, Francesco, dzook'-ka-rail'-le, an eminent Italian painter, who, in 1752, repaired to England, where he painted landscapes with distinguished success, and was elected one of the original members of the Royal Academy. Several of his works are contained in Hampton Court. After acquiring a fortune in England, he retired to Florence in 1773; but, having lost his property in a speculation, he again took up his brush, and was well occupied by the English visitors to Florence. b. at Pitigliano, near Florence, 1702; d. at Florence, 1788.

ZUCCARO, Taddeo, dzook'-ka-ro, an Italian painter, who studied the works of Raffaele, and, by his acquaintance with anatomy, excelled in painting human figures. b. 1529; d. at Rome, 1586.—His brother Frederick was also an eminent artist, but was obliged to quit Rome for painting a picture in which several officers of the papal court were represented with asses' ears. He afterwards went to Spain (where he was commissioned by Philip II. to decorate the Escorial with paintings), France, and England, and was employed by persons of the highest rank. The pope subsequently recalled him, appointed him president of the Academy of St. Luke, and gave him the title of prince. b. in Italy, 1543; d. at Rome, 1609.

ZUMALACARRGUI, Tomas, thu'-ma-la-car'-rai-guy, a Spanish general of the Carlist party, who, at the death of Ferdinand VII., in 1833, held the grade of colonel; but, having resolved to oppose the queen, he joined the Carlist insurgents in the Basque provinces. As commander of the Carlists, he defeated the queen's army in four battles, but died of a wound which he received while preparing to storm Bilbao. b. 1788; d. 1835.

ZUMMER, Carl Gottlieb, tsoompt, an eminent modern German philologist, who studied at the universities of Heidelberg and Berlin, at which latter seat of learning he, after holding some minor scholastic appointments, was nominated professor of Roman literature in 1828. In 1835 he became a member of the Berlin Royal Academy of Sciences. He wrote a great work entitled "The Latin Grammar," two translations of which have been published in England. He likewise produced "On the Court of the Centumvirs," "On the Personal Freedom of the Roman Citizen," and editions of Cicero's "Orations," &c. b. at Berlin, 1792; d. 1849.

ZURBARAN, Francisco, thoor'-ba-ran, a celebrated Spanish painter, who was employed to paint altarpieces for the cathedral of Seville, and also for the churches at Madrid. He received the appointment of painter to Philip III. The Louvre, at Paris, contains eighty-one pictures by this master. In the National Gallery, in London, there is only one of his works; but several fine pictures by him are in the possession of private gentlemen and noblemen. b. in Estremadura, 1598; d. at Seville, 1662.

ZURITA, Geronymo, thu'-re-ta, a celebrated Spanish historian, who, in 1549, was appointed chronicler of the states of Aragon, and, in 1567, became private secretary to Philip II. He produced, among other learned and valuable works, "The Chronicles of Aragon," and commentaries upon Cæsar, Claudian, and the "Antonine Itinerary." He discovered the "Chronicon Alexandrinum," which was published by Dugange in his "Byzantine Historians." b. at Saragossa, 1512; d. at the same city, 1581.

ZWINGLI, or ZURINGLI, Ulric, zwing'-le, the "reformer of Switzerland," at first officiated as a priest at Zurich; but seeing the corruptions of the church of Rome, he commenced declaiming against them, and continued his exhortations until he effected an ecclesiastical reformation throughout the republic. He published a book on the Eucharist, in which he denied the Lutheran doctrine. This occasioned a great controversy, and his followers were called Zwinglians. He afterwards took up arms against the Catholics, and died on the field of battle, in 1531. His works consist of controversial treatises, and commentaries upon the Scriptures. b. at Wildhaus, in the Toggenburg, 1484.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SIXTH THOUSAND.

Now Ready, New Edition, post 8vo, half-bound, price 7s. 6d. ; half-calf, 10s. 6d.
BEETON'S (Mrs.) BOOK OF HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT, comprising every kind of Practical Information on Domestic Economy and Modern Cookery, with numerous Woodcuts and Coloured Illustrations.

"Mrs. Isabella Beeton's 'Book of Household Management' aims at being a compendium of household duties in every grade of household life, from the mistress to the maid-of-all-work. It is illustrated by numerous diagrams, exhibiting the various articles of food in their original state, and there are also coloured plates to show how they ought to look when dished and ready for the table. The verdict of a practical cook of great experience, on returning the book to her mistress, was, 'Ma'am, I consider it an excellent work; it is full of useful information about everything, which is quite delightful; and I should say any one might learn to cook from it who never tried before.'"—The Athenæum.

Demy 8vo, half-roan, price 15s. ; half calf, 18s. 6d. With Maps and Illustrations.

BEETON'S DICTIONARY OF UNIVERSAL INFORMATION,
A to Z, comprising Geography, Biography, History, Mythology, Biblical Knowledge, Chronology, with the Pronunciation of every Proper Name.

"The 'Dictionary of Universal Information,' just published by Mr. S. O. Beeton, supplies a desideratum much and widely felt—that of a comprehensive yet portable dictionary of proper names. The 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' the 'English Encyclopædia,' and the other great digests of human knowledge, in consequence of their high price, are accessible only to a few. In such works no special provision is made for supplying short and comprehensive information regarding individual words, arranged in their alphabetical order, of the kind most likely to be required by the great mass of general readers. Mr. Beeton to some extent enters a new field in devoting a Dictionary exclusively to proper names in Geography, History, Biography, Mythology, Bible Knowledge and Chronology. In these pages condensation has been in every way sought after, and we know of no work which supplies more information at a smaller cost."—The Times.
